

Jens Christiansen is Professor of Economics and Environmental Studies at Mount Holyoke College where he has taught since 1986. He is currently chair of the Economics Department and the Program in European Studies. He has held visiting positions at the Indian Institute of Management Bangalore, Stanford University, the University of California at Santa Cruz, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, and Yale University. His major interest and concern at this point are the politics and economics of global climate change. Other research interests and many of his recent publications focus on questions of comparative economic performance in the G-7. In particular, he has examined the differences in productivity growth, inequality, and unemployment among these economies. He is the co-editor of Working Europe: Reshaping European Employment Systems, published by Ashgate in 1999 and the author or co-author of dozens of articles in leading academic and more popular journals. He has also presented his research findings at numerous international conferences and has been an economic commentator on radio and television programs.

Christiansen is a founding member of the Environmental Studies Program at Mount Holyoke College that offers students a truly interdisciplinary perspective on environmental issues.

He is married, has two children, is an avid gardener, and likes to travel.