Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides introduction and development of fundamental concepts including stoichiometry, reactions in aqueous solutions, thermochemistry, atomic structure, chemical bonding, and acid-base reactions. The laboratory emphasizes basic skills, quantitative chemical measurements, and principles discussed in lectures.

CHEM-110-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Forensic Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course will offer an introduction to the science behind forensic investigations. We will explore the role of the forensic scientist, as well as the methods and instruments they use, such as mass spectrometry, infrared spectroscopy and DNA analysis, which are valuable tools in evaluating crime scene evidence. We will examine the validity of scientific findings, how they are evaluated, and the political implications of the use and availability of the data. Students will have a chance to be expert witnesses as they analyze evidence in the lab and report on their findings. Analytical thinking and processing information in chemistry, biology, and other sciences will be emphasized, as well as oral and written communication skills. Short labs are planned.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: T. Breton

CHEM-110-04 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Solar Energy: Technology, Policy, and Impact - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar
The way humans use energy has been the driving force behind major social and environmental changes in the 20th and 21st centuries. An understanding of modern energy sources and their impact on society is critical to informed decision-making by citizens and policymakers. This course will introduce students to a broad range of topics related to energy use by focusing on examples related to solar energy. Students will become familiar with the technical concepts behind photovoltaics and solar fuels. We will also explore the economic aspects of energy usage and the policies that are commonly used to encourage renewable energy generation.

CHEM-199-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Spring) Introduction to Research
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This seminar is for first-year students who have a strong interest in the chemical sciences and will help to prepare them for scientific research. Students will be exposed to various research topics through reading, discussing, presenting, and writing about primary literature and attending selected department seminars. Throughout the semester students will carry out one research-style project in order to gain experience with the multifaceted nature of scientific inquiry. To jump start their research career on campus, each student will arrange meetings with at least two science faculty followed by a presentation and a written description on the faculty members’ research topics.
Prerequisites: FY, Math 101 (prerequisite), Chemistry 201 (co-requisite) and permission by instructor.
Instructors: W. Chen
Expected enrollment: 16

CHEM-212-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Spring) Chemistry of Biomolecules - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An examination of the major ideas of biochemistry from the point of view of the chemical sciences rather than the life sciences. Structures of important biomolecules. The role of energetics and reaction dynamics in biochemical processes. Major metabolic pathways are considered, including those of proteins, carbohydrates, lipids, and nucleic acids.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 202
Notes: This course is not intended for Biochemistry majors, who must complete Biochemistry 311f and 314s.
Instructors: K. McMenimen

CHEM-224-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Spring) Analytical Chemistry of Art Analysis Laboratory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This half-semester course introduces concepts of analytical chemistry under the theme of "Chemistry in Art". The topics of quantitative chemical analysis and instrumental analysis are discussed through hands-on observation based experiments in collaboration with the Mount Holyoke College art museum. Experimental techniques -- such as gas chromatography, mass spectrometry, X-ray fluorescence, UV visible spectroscopy, infrared spectroscopy, and scanning electron microscopy -- are incorporated for the analysis of paintings and art objects.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Chemistry 201 or 202 as a prerequisite or co-requisite.
Notes: This is offered half semester only.
Instructors: H. Jayathilake
Expected enrollment: 8

CHEM-295-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Independent work in chemistry can be conducted with any member of the department.
Prerequisites: soph, permission of department required every semester
Notes: Note: Students conducting an independent laboratory research project for course credit in a department, program, or laboratory covered by the

CHEM-304-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Spring) Advanced Organic Chemistry Laboratory
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This half-semester course, starting after spring break, applies and builds upon the techniques and tools of synthetic organic chemistry acquired during previous laboratory classes. Experiments will be selected to provide exposure to contemporary synthetic methods, to offer examples of the application of sophisticated reagents, to afford practice in modern separation and purification approaches, and provide scope for hands-on acquisition of Nuclear Magnetic Resonance (NMR) spectra.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor and Chemistry 302 as prerequisite or co-requisite
Notes: second half of semester
Instructors: A. Figueiredo
Expected enrollment: 8

CHEM-311-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) Protein Biochemistry and Cellular Metabolism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Biochemistry 311, Biological Sciences 311)
This course is a rigorous introduction to the study of protein molecules and their role as catalysts of the cell. Topics include general principles of protein folding, protein structure-function correlation, enzyme kinetics and mechanism, carbohydrate and lipid biochemistry, and metabolic pathways (catabolic and anabolic) and their interaction and cross-regulation. Biological transformation of energy is considered in light of the principle of thermodynamics.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 (can be taken concurrently), and Chemistry 302
Instructors: V. Lukose

CHEM-317-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Spring) Introduction to Polymer Chemistry - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An introduction to the study of molecules of high molecular weights with emphasis on synthetic rather than naturally occurring polymers. Topics include polymerization, structures, molecular weight determination, molecular weight distribution, chain configurations, rubber elasticity, and thermodynamics and statistical mechanics of polymer solutions.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 302
Notes: offered once every three years
Instructors: W. Chen
Expected enrollment: 16

CHEM-325-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) Atomic and Molecular Structure - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is an introduction to experimental and theoretical approaches to the determination of the structure of atoms, molecules, and chemical bonds. Classroom work provides background in the theory of atomic and molecular structure and an introduction to quantum mechanics and spectroscopy.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 102/202, Chemistry 202 and Electromagnetism (Physics 201), all with grade of C or better; Mathematics 203 is recommended
Instructors: H. Jayathilake

CHEM-337-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) Physical Organic Chemistry - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
An introduction to the concepts and methods of physical organic chemistry. An examination of the mechanistic principles underlying free radical, ionic, pericyclic, and photochemical reactions, and the experimental and theoretical support for mechanistic postulates. Topics will include qualitative molecular orbital concepts, reaction kinetics, thermodynamics, and an introduction to computational methods.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 302
Instructors: G. Snyder
Expected enrollment: 20

CHEM-346-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016
(Fall) Physical Chemistry of Biochemical Systems with Laboratory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an overview of the fundamental principles of physical chemistry with an emphasis on their application to the study of biological molecules and processes. Topics will include quantum mechanics, statistical mechanics and thermodynamics. Discussion of applications will relate commonly used experimental techniques -- such as spectroscopy and calorimetry -- to the fundamental principles on which they are based. In addition, students will gain experience and confidence in the use of mathematical models to describe biochemical systems.
Prerequisites: Math 102/202 and Physics 110 and Chemistry 202 with a grade of C or better

CHEM-399-01 - Chemistry - 2015-2016

(Fall) Comprehensive Seminar
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
A seminar series consisting of meetings on alternate weeks to discuss articles from the current chemical literature. The readings will prepare students for attendance at lectures on the chosen topics in the remaining weeks. The lectures are given primarily by visiting speakers, but they may include department faculty. Students will serve as discussion leaders, and each student will write a paper on a presentation of her choice.
Prerequisites: Chemistry majors only. Two semesters required, spring (as a junior) fall (as a senior)
Notes: Credit/No Credit grading only
Instructors: M. Gomez

Classics

CLASS-205-01 - Classics - 2015-2016

(Fall) Cleopatra: "The Not Humble Woman" - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
In this course Cleopatra will be considered both as a political figure of importance in her own right and also as an enemy queen, representing a presumptuous challenge to the political hegemony and cultural values of the Romans. She may serve, therefore, as a lens through which one may view social and political tensions within Roman society over the nature of authority and empire. Readings include Vergil, Horace, Propertius, Lucan, Caesar, Sallust, Plutarch and the plays of Shakespeare and Shaw, where she is ambivalently portrayed as a woman who desires power or, contrariwise, as a romantic idealist who scorns temporal powers in fulfillment of private desires.
CLASS-211-01 - Classics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Gods and Mortals: Ancient Greek and Roman Myth
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
We will accompany Odysseus on his return from Troy, retrieve the Golden Fleece with Jason, and race with Ovid through his witty—and often troubling—retelling of Greek myths from a Roman perspective. This course examines how Greek and Roman authors and artists from very different periods used myth to explore questions about life, art, and politics. Works include: Homer, Odyssey; Apollonius of Rhodes, Argonautica; Ovid, Metamorphoses and Heroides; Greek tragedy, and ancient images representing myths.
Notes: Open to first-year students.
Instructors: B. Arnold
Expected enrollment: 30

CLASS-212-01 - Classics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Greek Tragedy, American Drama, and Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
This course examines the critical influence of the three most important Athenian dramatists, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, on the works of modern dramatists and filmmakers, including Eugene O'Neill, Tennessee Williams, Arthur Miller, Roman Polanski, Woody Allen, Ridley Scott, Jules Dassin, Theodoros Angelopoulos, and others. Attention is given to the different concepts of tragedy underlying the genre, such as the tragedy of self-knowledge and illusion, the tragedy of desire, the tragedy of sin and redemption, and tragedy as protest against social injustice.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes) plus 1 screening
Instructors: B. Arnold
Expected enrollment: 40

CLASS-212-01 - Classics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Greek Tragedy and Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Theatre Arts 234GR)
This course examines the evolution of tragedy in classical Athens from choral performance to sophisticated drama through the contributions of the three most important tragedians: Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Attention is given both to the political context in which the plays were performed and to the dramatic effects employed by the playwrights that made the stage an influential medium of powerful artistry. Students will also study the influence of ancient tragedy on film by examining dramatic strategies modern directors employ and the allusions to Greek tragedy found in some innovative films by Roman Polanski, Woody Allen, Jules Dassin, Michael Cacoyannis, and others.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes) plus 1 screening
Instructors: B. Arnold

(Spring) Athenian Democracy and Its Foes - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Democracy first took root in Athens in the late sixth century BCE and flourished, with only brief interruptions, until the city came under the power of Macedon in the latter part of the fourth century BCE. This course will trace the development of Athenian democracy and examine such topics as citizenship; the role of women, the family, and non-citizens in Athens; the legal system; education; and public entertainment. It will also compare democratic Athens with Sparta, its antithesis in the classical period. Sources will include Herodotus, Thucydides, Aristophanes, Plato, Aristotle, Demosthenes, and others.
Instructors: P. Debnar

(Spring) Bread and Circuses: The Politics of Public Entertainment in Ancient Rome
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
"Bread and circuses" (panem et circenses) was a catchphrase in the Roman empire that described the political strategy of controlling an unruly populace through free bread and public entertainment. Against a backdrop of Roman social and political institutions, this course focuses on the imperial ideology, aristocratic ethos, and cultural practices that underpinned this catchphrase, as well as questions concerning the careers of entertainers—gladiators, charioters, and actors—who were at once celebrities and social outcasts; the rules of spectatorship at the games; the use of these games as a form of social control; and the logistics of feeding the city population.

(Fall) Ancient Rome
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 128)
Ancient Rome and its empire can be viewed both as a measure of human achievement and a cautionary tale of the corrupting effects of unbridled power. This course covers the history of Ancient Rome from its mythologized beginnings (753 BCE) to the rise and spread of Christianity under the Emperor Constantine (312 CE). Topics include the creation and development of Rome’s republican form of government as well as its eventual transition to monarchy, the causes and consequences of the acquisition of empire, the role of the army in administering the provinces and defending the frontiers, the image of emperor, the economy, and religion.
Notes: Open to first-year students

(Spring) The City of Athens from Theseus to Alaric
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English; Art History 290TH)
A detailed survey of the principal surviving monuments and the overall architectural development of the city of Athens from its origins in the Bronze Age to the end of the 4th century C.E. The archaeological evidence will be discussed against a broader cultural and historical background, with an emphasis on the specific people and events that helped to shape the city and the general social and political circumstances that gave the monuments meaning.

(Spring) Knowing God - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines the following key texts from the ancient world that treat significantly the problem of knowing God and the mystery enveloping such knowledge: Sophocles’ Oedipus the King, Plato’s Phaedo, Cicero’s Concerning the Nature of the Gods, Job, Paul’s Epistle to the Romans, and others. Attention is also given to the different ways of thinking about the divine and human natures in these works, which are broadly reflective of Graeco-Roman and Judaeo-Christian value systems.

(Spring) Politics and Greek Tragedy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 329)
Students in this course will explore ancient Greek tragedy as a way of thinking through such central problems of political life as freedom, identity, responsibility, and justice. The course will place the ancient texts in their particular historical context, while also attending to the material as a springboard for confronting contemporary political questions. The course will also address the broader implications of turning to ancient material and to literature as sources for political theorizing.

(Spring) Socrates Against the Sophists - *Not offered this year/term
(Philosophy 350NT)
In a number of Plato's dialogues we find the character Socrates debating various sophists--itinerant teachers-for-hire whose views were often diametrically opposed to Socrates' own. This seminar is structured around a close, careful reading of three such dialogues: the Euthydemus, the Protagoras, and the Gorgias. These dialogues will offer a general introduction to Socratic philosophy, but we will also focus on a few issues in much greater detail. Chief among those special topics will be questions about the nature and value of moral knowledge, the possibility of moral education, and the efficacy of the Socratic method of inquiry.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Philosophy or Classics (or in a combination of Philosophy and Classics) or permission of instructor

(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Encountering the Sacred: The Bible and Reading - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Martin Buber famously wrote that we must read the Bible "as though it were something entirely unfamiliar, as though it had not been set before us ready-made." Whether you come to the Bible from within a faith tradition or not, this course will ask you to do just that. We'll take a text that for more than 2,000 years has stood at the heart of the Western tradition and ask how we can approach that text today, from the place where you stand. What does it mean to read a sacred text? How has it been read by people situated both within and at the margins of Western culture? What are the possibilities for your reading?

(Spring) Introductory Seminar: Op-ed: Writing on Politics, Culture, and the Arts - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
We will read and discuss current writing on politics, culture and the arts. Drawn from a variety of print and on-line sources (including The New Yorker, n+1, Arts and Letters Daily, and Bomb), subjects will range from literature, cinema, and art to international politics, crime, and celebrity culture. Using strategies and techniques learned from the readings, students will write essays and articles of their own.

(Spring) Introductory Seminar: Literature and Politics: The Power of Words - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English)
Literature and politics: what are the connections? How do writers combine their literary and political goals? How does their work impact politics? What literary genres do they employ – utopianism, realism, magic realism, satire, modernism, or postmodernism? How do governments react to literary challenges? We will look closely at the texts themselves, examine the interaction between aesthetics and politics, but also focus on the social and political context. Why was the book written, and in what way did the book impact the politics and ideas of its time? Authors will include Shakespeare, Rousseau, Swift, Dickens, Orwell, Sartre, Andrei Platonov, Solzhenitsyn, Rushdie, and Chinua Achebe.

(Spring) Global Challenges: The Future of Jobs: The Dual Challenge of Globalization and Robotization
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Over the last two decades, the globalization of production and labor markets has made jobs and working conditions increasingly more precarious around the world. Against this backdrop we are now at the dawn of a technological revolution with potentially systemic impact on production, jobs, and livelihoods. Through analysis and hands-on activities, we study the impact of globalization and robotization on the future of jobs in the Global North and South. Where will the jobs of the future be? If technology were to enable us to work less, what would new social contracts have to look like so that people can have a decent living?
Notes: The course meets Wednesday nights (Jan 20, 27, Feb 3, 10, 17, March 2), 7-9:30 pm. Class length will vary depending on activity (lecture, discussion, lab work). Students are required to attend the conference on the same topic (Febr 19-20).

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Learn to speak with confidence and clarity about your summer internship or research project. What have you learned? How is it useful? What are your next steps? Students will reflect on their experience and collaborate with others to generate useful knowledge. Required for the Nexus but open to all students. For more information, email nexus-wm@mtholyoke.edu.
Notes: Class meeting dates: 9/14, 9/21, 9/28, 10/5, 10/19, 10/23 (LEAP Symposium), 10/26. All students will present at LEAP Symposium on 10/23.

COLL-225-02 - College Courses - 2015-2016
(Fall) Topics in Leadership: Women, Business, and Leadership Development - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
What does leadership mean and what does it look like? What does it mean to become as leader in a business context? And what does this mean for women? In this half-semester course, we will examine research literature and case examples from various business contexts including small businesses, nonprofits, and larger corporations. Topics will include: leadership capacities, models of leading and managing, effective mentoring and networking, women's career development, and negotiation and influence.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Notes: Half-semester course, October 20 - December 8. No letter-grading (credit/no-credit only). Cannot be repeated if taken in Fall 2012.
Instructors: B. Packard, J. Lansberry
COLL-250-01 - College Courses - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar: War: What Is It Good For? - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
A multidisciplinary examination of the various ways humans have understood, represented, experienced, and justified war over time and across cultures. The course considers the representation of war through art, literature, and music. It analyzes possible causes of war, including innate human drives, gender differences, socialization, and economic and resource competition. In addition, it examines justifications for war from a range of ethical perspectives. Faculty from various disciplines will be asked to guest lecture.
Instructors: S. Hashmi
Expected enrollment: 40

COLL-295-01 - College Courses - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr, and permission of instructor
Instructors: The department

COMOR-205-01 - Complex Organizations - 2015-2016
(Spring) Financial Accounting
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
The course, while using traditional accounting techniques and methodology, will focus on the needs of external users of financial information. The emphasis is on learning how to read, interpret, and analyze financial information as a tool to guide investment decisions. Concepts rather than procedures are stressed and class time will be largely devoted to problem solutions and case discussions. A basic knowledge of arithmetic (+,-,*,/) and a familiarity with a spreadsheet program is suggested.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Instructors: S. Schmeiser
Expected enrollment: 40

COMOR-212-01 - Complex Organizations - 2015-2016
(Fall) Individuals and Organizations
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Psychology 212)
This course focuses on individual and small-group behavior in the organizational setting. The basic objective is to increase knowledge and understanding of human behavior in organizations - especially each individual's own behavior. Three types of knowledge are stressed: (1) intellectual information regarding human behavior in an organizational context; (2) understanding of oneself as a person and as a leader; and (3) behavioral skills in dealing with people.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr
Instructors: D. Butterfield
Expected enrollment: 40

COMOR-218-01 - Complex Organizations - 2015-2016
(Fall) Perspectives in Global Business

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

We will study the behavior of consumers, producers, and their interactions in markets. How do consumer, producer, and social welfare depend on market organization and regulatory institutions? How do competition and international trade affect consumers and firms? How do the decisions that businesses make affect employees, customers, suppliers, the community, and the environment? How do businesses make decisions about advertising and pricing? We will use case studies and microeconomic theory to explore these and other questions.

Instructors: S. Schmeiser
Expected enrollment: 30

COMOR-227-01 - Complex Organizations - 2015-2016
(Spring) Is Business Moral?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

Is engaging in business a moral activity? Is virtuous business activity that which is inherently virtuous or that which benefits society? Are there moral obligations surrounding how workers are treated? Is the ability of business to elevate our material standard of living a good thing? Through reading the Great Books of Western Civilization, we will look at what philosophers and novelists argued about business ethics starting with Athens and Jerusalem, proceeding through the English Financial Revolution, the Industrial Revolution, the Gilded Age, the Progressive Era, and into contemporary society. Authors will include Aquinas, Mandeville, Dickens, Thoreau, Dreiser, Shaw, and Wolfe.

Instructors: J. Hartley
Expected enrollment: 19

COMOR-249-01 - Complex Organizations - 2015-2016
(Spring) Non-Profit Business Practice

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

This course introduces students to the issues and challenges of leading a non-profit organization. Covered topics include dealing with boards, workers and volunteers and external agencies. We will consider funding and revenue sources as well as cost management. Finally, the course will explore strategic planning and program evaluation. The course will feature an embedded practitioner with substantial leadership experience in higher education.

Notes: The course will be a case study based course and students will be required to do a substantial project on a non-profit of their choosing.

Instructors: M. Robinson
Expected enrollment: 40

(Spring) Advanced Topics: Social Entrepreneurship

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Students explore themselves, talents, motivations and dreams to realize new ways to address social needs and change through enterprise development. Grounded in experiential learning, this class is a balance of theory, hands-on learning, best practices and skills building. Students actively engage in creating or advising a social enterprise. Students will work in small teams to complete and present a sustainability assessment for an actual social enterprise and create and implement a quantitatively verifiable solution to a social business need.

Prerequisites: jr, sr. No prior entrepreneurship or business experience is necessary.
Notes: Class includes case studies, guest speakers, and a possible field trip.
Instructors: T. Stenn

COMSC-100-01 - Computer Science - 2015-2016
(Fall) An Introduction to Computer Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An introduction to basic computer science concepts with a focus on Python programming to manipulate images and sounds. Laboratory assignments will provide the main programming opportunities with Python, images, and sounds, while lectures will cover topics such as the origins of computing, computer architecture, artificial intelligence, and robotics.
Notes: students should NOT take this course after Computer Science 101

(Fall) Problem Solving and Object-Oriented Programming
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Computers are used every day for an enormous variety of tasks, from playing games and chatting with friends to transferring billions of dollars, delivering radiation treatments, and controlling the electrical grid. Computer programs are an essential ingredient in allowing for this great diversity of applications. In this course, you will learn to create your own programs, based on core programming concepts and analytical problem solving approaches. You will develop dynamic programs by first using Adobe Flash AS3 (ActionScript 3), the technology behind many Web applications. The last portion of the course will teach you Java, a very popular modern programming language. We assume no prior study of computer science.
Programming intensive.

COMSC-103-01 - Computer Science - 2015-2016
(Fall) Networks
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

How do opinions, fads, and political movements spread through society? What makes food webs and financial markets robust? What are the technological, political, and economic forces at play in online communities? This course examines connections between the social, technological, and natural worlds through the lens of networks. Students will learn basics of graph theory and game theory and apply them to build mathematical models of processes that take place in networks.

COMSC-106-01 - Computer Science - 2015-2016
(Spring) Introduction to Scientific Computing
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Have you ever used Google's image search tool and wondered how the search results were found? Why is it so difficult for a computer to "see" as we do? Course material will be framed in the context of computer vision, an active area of research in computer science addressing this general topic. This introduction to scientific computing will use the Python programming language and open source libraries. No prior study of computer science is expected.

(Fall) iDesign Studio
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Designers are continually innovating ways of incorporating technology into today's world, from projections of butterflies on Grammy performance dresses to "smart" purses that sense when your wallet is missing. The recent emergence of low-cost, user-friendly components is making this new world of design accessible to a broad community. In this course, students will think critically about products already in the marketplace and will be... given the tools to create their own designs. A sequence of hands-on workshops on electronics basics and microcontroller programming will provide the surprisingly minimal level of comfort and background in technology required to produce prototypes of these designs.

COMSC-201-01 - Computer Science - 2015-2016
(Fall) Advanced Object-Oriented Programming
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course builds on the basic programming concepts learned in Computer Science 101. Emphasis is on developing the skills needed to write more sophisticated programs. This includes strategies to aid in assuring the correctness of programs through the use of assertions and unit testing as well as advanced Java features such as inheritance, polymorphism, and network programming. We will also introduce some widely used data structures such as vectors and linked lists. This course is programming-intensive.

(Fall) Data Structures
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Using Java. Solving problems with computers is accomplished by writing programs that operate on data to produce a desired result. The way data is organized and presented to the program can significantly affect its efficiency and simplicity and can sometimes determine whether or not a program can be written to solve the problem at all. This course presents ways of organizing data into "data structures" and analyzes how structuring the data can improve program performance. This course is programming intensive.

(Fall) Software Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Building large software systems introduces new challenges to software development. Appropriate design decisions early in the development of large software can make a major difference in developing software that is correct and maintainable. In this course, students will learn techniques and tools to help them address these problems and develop larger software projects, improving their skills in designing, writing, debugging, and testing software. Topics include design patterns, UML, designing for maintainability, software architecture, and designing concurrent and fault tolerant systems. Programming intensive.

COMSC-243-01 - Computer Science - 2015-2016
(Fall) Topics: Scientific and Parallel Computing
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
How powerful is your smartphone, tablet, or laptop? Can a computer predict earthquakes or simulate climate change? How much processing power does it take to render a 3D movie? Parallelism is ubiquitous in computing, especially scientific computing, as it increases system performance in the face of ever more challenging applications. Parallelism complicates everything from hardware design to operating systems to algorithms and programming. This course examines issues and techniques for parallel programming, the scientific applications of parallelism, and the efficiency and complexity of parallel algorithms.

(Fall) Theory of Computation

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Are there any limits to what computers can do? Does the answer to this question depend on whether you use a PC or a Mac? Is C more powerful than PASCAL? This seminar explores these questions by investigating several models of computation, illustrating the power and limitations of each of these models, and relating them to computational problems and applications. Topics include finite state automata, pushdown automata, grammars, Turing machines, the Universal Turing Machine, and computability.

(Spring) Algorithms

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

How does Mapquest find the best route between two locations? How do computers help to decode the human genome? At the heart of these and other complex computer applications are nontrivial algorithms. While algorithms must be specialized to an application, there are some standard ways of approaching algorithmic problems that tend to be useful in many applications. Among other topics, we will explore graph algorithms, greedy algorithms, divide-and-conquer, dynamic programming, and network flow. We will learn to recognize when to apply each of these strategies as well as to evaluate the expected runtime costs of the algorithms we design.

(Spring) Software Practicum - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Tired of writing programs that nobody ever uses? Then, this is the course for you. Software enables enterprises to carry out previously tedious or impossible tasks, but many organizations lack the resources to develop needed software. You will apply your programming skills to develop and deliver software to meet the requirements of a client from the community. You will learn critical communication skills required to work with a client, work as a team with classmates, and experience the software lifecycle from requirements elicitation through delivery. You will synthesize many topics learned in courses as well as new technologies required to complete the project. Programming intensive.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 215 and permission of instructor.

(Fall) Operating Systems

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An introduction to the issues involved in orchestrating the use of computer resources. Topics include operating system evolution, file-handling systems, memory management, virtual memory, resource scheduling, multiprogramming, deadlocks, concurrent processes, protection, and design principles. Course emphasis: understanding the effects of operating system design on computer system performance. This course is programming intensive.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 211 and 221

Instructors: B. Lerner

(Spring) Computer Graphics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

The creation of pictorial images using a computer. Topics include drawing of two- and three-dimensional scenes using OpenGL and other graphical environments; transformations of objects (translations, scalings, rotations, shearrings) using homogeneous coordinates; creating perspective in three-dimensional drawing; algorithms for enhancing realism and visual effect; and the mathematical underpinnings of graphic design. Students will complete a number of graphics projects based on readings and class discussion. This course is programming intensive.

(Spring) Artificial Intelligence
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Artificial Intelligence, as a field, has grown from its humble beginnings in science fiction to become one of the broadest fields in computer science, encompassing an incredibly wide array of topics. One of the common threads between these topics is "How do we build computer systems which exhibit logic and reason?" or rather "How do we build systems which can solve problems intelligently without resorting to brute force?" We'll cover a few major topics in this course, most notably search, logical reasoning, and planning as well as game playing/theory, uncertain reasoning, and graphical models. This course is programming intensive.

(Fall) Machine Learning - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

How does Netflix learn what movies a person likes? How do computers read handwritten addresses on packages, or detect faces in images? Machine learning is the practice of programming computers to learn and improve through experience, and it is becoming pervasive in technology and science. This course will cover the mathematical underpinnings, algorithms, and practices that enable a computer to learn. Topics will include supervised learning, unsupervised learning, evaluation methodology, and Bayesian probabilistic modeling. Students will learn to program in MATLAB or Python and apply course skills to solve real world prediction and pattern recognition problems. Programming Intensive.

(Fall) Programming Language Design and Implementation

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Ever wonder why there are so many semicolons in Java programs, or what it would mean for a language to not be object-oriented? In this course, we will explore issues related to the design and implementation of programming languages. Along the way, we will discover answers to these questions and more. Topics will include syntax, semantics, runtime support for languages as well as an introduction to functional programming.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 211

Critical Social Thought

CST-100-04 - Critical Social Thought - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Goodbye, Conventional Wisdom

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

One of the hallmarks of a liberal arts education is to draw on a broad base of knowledge in order to interrogate common assumptions. No one exemplifies this critical approach better than French philosopher Michel Foucault. One of the most influential thinkers of recent times, Foucault revolutionized several academic disciplines and even questioned the very notion of a discipline itself. He did so by revealing the history and transformations of ideas now viewed as self-evident. This first-year seminar invites students to develop similar analytical skills. Following Foucault's lead, the course pays special attention to preconceptions about government, freedom, identity, and sexuality.

(Spring) United Colors of Neoliberal America - *Not offered this year/term

(Speaking-intensive; English 223)
"What can Brown do for you?" This question captures a central theme of this course: how a word like "Brown" evolved from a 1970s signifier of antiracist coalition building into a motto of the United Parcel Service (UPS), selling speed, efficiency, and access to networks of the global economy. Using interdisciplinary methods, we will explore the way multicultural imagery, Civil Rights discourse, and state policy have converged in the service of global capitalism. Focusing on fiction (e.g., Octavia Butler, Karen Yamashita), film (e.g., Crash, Sleep Dealers) and secondary sources, we will examine the impact of neoliberal multiculturalism and how cultural producers amplify and challenge its logics.

(Spring) Black Political Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Africana Studies 238, Politics 238)
This course will focus on the writings of Black political thinkers in the Americas, Africa and Europe. Through critical examination of the conditions against, and contexts within, which the discourses of these thinkers are situated, this course hopes to arrive at some understanding of the principles, goals and strategies developed to contest and redefine the notions of citizenship (vis-à-vis the imperatives of race/racism and the global colonial formation), humanity, development, democracy, and freedom.

(Spring) Science, Revolution, and Modernity - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 248)
Introduces critical analysis of science and technology by tracing the historiography of the Scientific Revolution. The significance of this extended intellectual episode has been assessed in radically different ways throughout the intervening centuries. As such, it provides a fertile ground on which to pose and answer important questions about science and its role in society. What does it mean to regard science as 'revolutionary'? How are scientific developments shaped by, and how do they shape, the social, economic, and political worlds in which they are embedded? How is our contemporary understanding of science and technology influenced by the stories we tell about the past?

(Fall) Critical Race Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Africana Studies 208)
This course examines the discursive relationship between race and law in contemporary U.S. society. Readings examine the ways in which racial bodies are constituted in the cultural and political economy of American society. The main objective is to explore the rules and social practices that govern the relationship of race to gender, nationality, sexuality, and class in U.S. courts and other cultural institutions. Thinkers covered include W.E.B. DuBois, Kimberle Crenshaw, Derrick Bell, and Richard Delgado, among others.

(Spring) Rethinking (Under)Development in Latin America
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Latin American Studies 287DE)
When and how did the notion of "development" emerge and spread? Why does nearly every country now aspire to it? What stigmas and hierarchies does the term "under-development" imply? Throughout Latin America, such terms prove highly problematic not only with respect to the material reality they purport to describe but also as a framework for understanding place, time, and selfhood. In this course, students rethink conventional wisdom about "underdevelopment" through the study of writers, filmmakers, and painters from Latin America working at different historical junctures of the twentieth century.

(Spring) Race Governance
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Africana Studies 311, Politics 311)
The seminar will draw upon Foucauldian analytics of governmentality to engage the concept of race/racism as founded on, and maintained by, colonial material conditions mobilized for political outcomes. In exposing race as constituted by a colonial and governmental lineage rather than a biological or ethnic ancestry of origins, the course shifts the conceptual meaning of race/racism from its contemporary anchorage in ideology and biology, to the constitutive logics of colonial practices of governmentality in contemporary western liberal democracies. The seminar maps ways race/racism can be accounted for as necessary political tools routinely employed by states for administrative control.

CST-391-02 - Critical Social Thought - 2015-2016
(Fall) Pivotal Political Ideas: Capitalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 391CT)
After reviewing the classic defense of capitalism as an engine of freedom, progress, and productivity, we will examine major shifts in the critique of capitalism from the early 19th to the early 21st century. This critical conceptual history will range over successive claims that capitalism fosters labor exploitation and class inequality, imperialism, instrumentalism, the commodification of culture, the privatization of the commons, and the re-making of subjectivities to suit market imperatives. The course will conclude with Pope Francis's charge that the global capitalist system endangers "whatever is fragile, like the environment" and devours everything "in the way of increased profits." Is Francis right, and if so, what are possible cures for these ills?

(Fall) East Asian Economic Development

Preamble (for topics courses): This 200-level course investigates a particular topic in economics at some depth without presupposing prior knowledge of economics. Many students may find one or more of these courses useful complements to majors and minors other than economics.

This course provides an overview of economic development in East Asia. The complex interplay of public policy, global competition, and domestic economic relationships in China, Japan, and Korea will serve as the core subject matter of the course, though patterns of economic development in Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore will also be discussed. Special attention is given to conditions under which regional economies have successfully blended elements of import-substituting industrialization with export-oriented growth. The course will conclude with a discussion of the impact of the regional economic crisis, the current wave of reforms, and the potential for future growth and development.

Prerequisites: not open to first-year students as their first course in Economics

Instructors: S. Gabriel

Expected enrollment: 40

(Fall) History of Development Economic Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
A topical coverage of development economics used in conventional textbooks does not do justice to the evolution of integrated thinking in the field. A topical organization also does not do justice to the topic linkages or to the important debates in the field. This course adopts a history of macro development economics thought approach with an emphasis on alternative approaches right up to the current debates. While the field started in the 1940s, the influence of classical economists including Marx on the pioneering development economists and the field will also be traced.
Prerequisites: Economics 211 and 212 or permission of instructor
Instructors: S. Khan
Expected enrollment: 19

EDUST-203-01 - Educational Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Teaching Children Science: College Students in the Elementary Classroom
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course; Biological Sciences 203)
This course is designed for science students with interests in teaching and learning with children. It will focus on research, theory and practice pertinent to science education, linking scientific information gained in college classes to children's learning of scientific phenomena. Weekly class meetings (from 1-3 hours) will include laboratory and off-site field investigations. Each student will also become a "Science Buddy" at a local elementary school, assisting children with hands-on science experiences for approximately 1 hour each week.
Prerequisites: One year of college science (any discipline), at least one course with laboratory. By permission of instructor only: please email rfink or sfrenett if interested in being considered
Instructors: R. Fink
Expected enrollment: 10

EDUST-250-01 - Educational Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Special Topics in Educational Studies: Scholarly Pathways: Research, College Achievement and Post-Baccalaureate Futures
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Latina(o) Studies 250s (02))
This course demystifies college by focusing on three areas: 1) benefits of undergraduate research, 2) how to capitalize on the college experience, and 3) how to prepare for post-baccalaureate opportunities. Specifically, this course will teach students the elements of a research proposal by guiding them with original research. Moreover, students will learn strategies to thrive as undergraduates by exploring interests as means to finding their passion. In addition, this course will decipher the graduate/professional school application process. The overall goal of this course is to encourage and empower students to take their education and pre-professional experience into their own hands and equip them with the necessary tools to be successful.

(Fall) Children's Literature for Educators - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course introduces various genres of children's literature, including literature for adolescents; explores issues in interpretation and critique; and examines approaches to using literature in the preK-12 curriculum with an emphasis on making literature accessible to English language learners. Students will read a variety of texts across genres and discuss ways to integrate literature into content-area learning as they expand their knowledge and appreciation of children's literature. Literature will be examined from multiple perspectives including literary, sociopolitical, and historical.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Priority given to licensure students and students with 8 credits beyond the 100 level in the English department
Notes: Students must email the professor during advising week to ask permission to register for the course.
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 25

ENGL-101-03 - English - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Multicultural Families
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
This course examines the various ways the multicultural family in contemporary American, British, European, and South African culture is imagined by writers and filmmakers. Issues to be explored include: generational conflict, the struggle to "break away," and the claims of memory and nostalgia. Above all, the course seeks to explore the range of cultural forms in which these themes find expression.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: D. Weber
Expected enrollment: 16

(Fall) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: U.S. Multiethnic Literatures: Refracting America
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
This course examines African American, Asian American, Chicana/o-Latina/o, and Native American literature and cultural politics. Examining the historical intersection of race, gender, and sexuality, we will explore themes of cultural identity, segregation and community formation, citizenship, labor, class, and family. Authors may include Toni Morrison, Danzy Senna, Josefina López, Sherman Alexie, Junot Díaz, Jhumpa Lahiri, and Joy Kogawa.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: I. Day
Expected enrollment: 16

(Fall) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Black Women Writers
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
In this seminar we will explore various parts of the United States and the Caribbean through analyses of black women's contemporary literature and visual culture. The course will be organized around four themes prevalent in contemporary portrayals of the black female experience in the diaspora. The themes, Body, Voice, Memory, and Movement will allow us to examine notions of agency, representation and counter-narrative. How are narratives of resistance and possession appropriated by black women writers and image-makers and utilized for their own empowerment? What are the penalties inherent when a black woman "comes to voice" in the arena of self-representation?

(Spring) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Brave New Worlds - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course examines literary representations of worlds and world-making. We will explore how major British authors interpret the idea of the world, as well as how they construct fictional worlds of complexity and beauty. We will consider how the notion of "world" is defined in relation to the cosmos, nature, human society, empire, and travel. A consistent theme will be the depiction of other or new worlds, suggested by places that are remote, abstract, or imaginary. Readings may include Utopia, The Tempest, Paradise Lost, Gulliver's Travels, Robinson Crusoe, and The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.
Prerequisites: fy (soph, jr, and sr may inquire if there is space available during the first two weeks of class)
Instructors: S. Roychoudhury

ENGL-102-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Creative Writing for Multilingual Speakers
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Writing-intensive)
In this course, we will "enter the English language like explorers," as the poet Etel Adnan suggests. We will write poetry, short fiction, and essays. In the process, in honing our craft, we will develop writing skills that can be used across disciplines. We will experiment with language, form, and content; we will practice the all-important arts of giving and receiving feedback; we will revise and revise until we have said either what we wanted to say in the first place, or something better. We will also read short texts, composed in English, by multilingual writers such as Yiyun Li, Edwidge Danticat, Lê thi diem thuy, Gloria Anzaldúa, Chimamanda Adichie, and Junot Díaz.

(Fall) Academic Discourse and Multilingual Speakers - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): Course readings and writing assignments guide students through an examination of topics related to society and culture. In this course we seek to achieve clarity and precision of expression within a discussion of complex questions. Past semesters' topics include: the role of education in society; the relationship between religion, culture, and nature; and the use of maps in ordering the world. In addition to the academic content, the course focuses on the writing and revising process, academic research and argumentation, and the nature and purpose of academic discourse. This course is intended for students whose native language is not English and who would like to refine their writing and speaking skills. Although it is the first in a two-course sequence (103-104), multilingual students who have already taken English 104 may register.

(Fall) Introduction to Journalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based course; Writing-intensive)
The finest journalists are professors to the people. They educate citizens so as to facilitate reasoned, fact-based dialogue on subjects as diverse as politics, poverty, war, science, and the arts. We will look at journalism’s role in the culture with a particular view to some of the profession’s failings and foibles. Students are expected to leave the comfortable confines of the classroom as they try their hand at covering an event, writing a profile, and reporting on an issue of local significance. Throughout the term we will employ the journalistic skills of interviewing, research, and thoughtful analysis to produce snapshots of the world inside and outside the College gates. Curiosity leads. Mastery follows.

(Spring) Introduction to Journalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based course; Writing-intensive)
The finest journalists craft engaging narratives to help us better frame and understand our world. They inform us about the near and far (and sometimes extraterrestrial) with extensive research, sharp analysis and incisive critiques wrapped in stylish narratives. This will be our goal. To get there, students will study exceptional works (and some flops) in class, then step beyond their comfort zones to observe, research, analyze and interview as they cover an event, write a profile, and report on an issue of local significance. This is an intense seminar requiring considerable self-motivation.

(Fall) Playwriting
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course offers practice in the fundamentals of dramatic structure and technique. Weekly reading assignments will examine the unique nature of writing for the theatre, nuts and bolts of format, tools of the craft, and the playwright's process from formulating a dramatic idea to rewriting. Weekly writing assignments will include scene work, adaptation, and journaling. The course will culminate in the writing of a one-act play. Each class meeting will incorporate reading student work aloud with feedback from the instructor and the class. Students will listen, critique, and develop the vocabulary to discuss plays, structure, story, and content.

Prerequisites: an English writing course and one course in theatre arts, or permission of instructor

Notes: may be re-taken at 300 level with permission of instructor

(Spring) Expository Prose: Making the Argument - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Societies evolve through the exchange of information and ideas. This course explores that exchange as it occurs in contemporary opinion (or op-ed) pieces. Though we begin with Aristotle, most readings will come from the debates of our time. Our aim is to include divergent opinions on a wide array of subjects. Students will team up for close readings, exploring issues of evidence, structure and style. Extensive independent research and considerable rewriting required. This course is intended for students in all disciplines who seek mastery as prose stylists confronting the contentious issues of the day.

(Spring) Topics in Medieval Studies: The Curious Middle Ages
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; Medieval Studies 217CM)
While influenced by Augustine's warning that worldly inquiry could endanger the pilgrimage of the soul, medieval literature contains many instances of curious looking. Exploring the medieval desire to know, this course considers how the period's tendencies toward spiritual and metaphysical thought are balanced against its fascinations with the observable world. We will study the ways allegories, travel narratives, romances, and dream visions intersect with natural philosophy, historiography, cartography, and architecture. Literary analysis is the basis for our investigative work to uncover the epistemological impulses that inform medieval art and literature.
Prerequisites: A first-year seminar; English 210 or English 213 or History 115 or History 232 also recommended.
Notes: Meets English department pre-1700 requirement
Instructors: W. Yu

(Spring) Topics in English: Global English: Its Written and Spoken Forms

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

What is the relationship between language and social and political power? This course is an interdisciplinary study of the global role of the English language. Migration, education, and identity are major themes of the course, and we look at how linguists, policy-makers, and individuals grapple with these complex topics. This course also focuses on students’ development of their written and spoken communication skills and is open to students in all disciplines. Our approach to writing and speaking may be particularly effective for students who do not identify as native speakers of English.

(Spring) Topics in English: British and Irish Fiction 1900-1945

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course examines fiction by some of the key British and Irish writers from the first half of the twentieth century (1900-1945). We will be interested in the ways in which the form and content of the novel and the short story have been impacted by changes in social and cultural contexts. The course will cover topics such as the end of empire, the influence of developments in science, philosophy, and psychology, and the pervasive influence of music on modernist writers. The reading list will include works by James Joyce, Virginia Woolf, Katherine Mansfield, Elizabeth Bowen, and Flann O’Brien.

Prerequisites: English 200

(Spring) Topics in English: Introduction to Latina/o Literatures

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 204LS, Latina/o Studies 212)

We will explore a number of readings across different genres (the novel, play, poem, short story, graphic novel). Students will endeavor to understand how each author defines Latinidad. What characterizes Latina/o for each of these writers and how do their works articulate the historical conditions out of which they emerge? How is Latina/o literature marked by notions of language, nationality, gender, sexuality, class, race, politics, form, and genre? The readings will provide both a survey of general ideas in the study of Latina/o literatures as well as specific case studies and historical examples. The reading list is not meant to be comprehensive but to provide a sampling of texts.

*(Full) Introduction to British Literary and Cultural Studies since 1660: The Victorian Period - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a broad study of selected figures in modern literary and intellectual history and helps prepare students for more advanced classes in British and/or postcolonial studies. We will use these figures to probe the dynamic relationship between imaginative practice and social change, which may involve global as well as national contexts. This course will introduce students to writing sustained pieces of critical analysis, challenging them to explore the theoretical relationship between literary form and historical transformation in the modern period. This section examines the major ideas, shifts, expansions, and disruptions of the Victorian period. We will discuss prose, poetry, fiction, and art to understand how these forms engage with movements in voting rights, industry, living conditions, money, gender, definitions of class, and imperialist expansion. Writers may include Arnold, Carlyle, Martineau, Mill, Eliot, Dickens, Bronte, W. Collins, Browning, Rossetti, Hopkins, and many others, as well as painters and current readings in criticism and theory.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr and 4 credits in English

*(Spring) United Colors of Neoliberal America - Not offered this year/term

(Speaking-intensive; Critical Social Thought 223)
"What can Brown do for you?" This question captures a central theme of this course: how a word like "Brown" evolved from a 1970s signifier of antiracist coalition building into a motto of the United Parcel Service (UPS), selling speed, efficiency, and access to networks of the global economy. Using interdisciplinary methods, we will explore the way multicultural imagery, Civil Rights discourse, and state policy have converged in the service of global capitalism. Focusing on fiction (e.g., Octavia Butler, Karen Yamashita), film (e.g., Crash, Sleep Dealer) and secondary sources, we will examine the impact of neoliberal multiculturalism and how cultural producers amplify and challenge its logics.

(Spring) British Romanticism: Revolution and Reaction - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This class will examine the ways Romantic-era writers figured revolution and the reaction against it, in the wake of the French Revolution's spectacular but failed promises of liberty, fraternity, and equality for all. We will pay special attention to how British writers envisioned their own versions of freedom and equality, extending them to women, slaves, and the poor. Likewise we will explore how this project for social change was necessarily related to revolutions in language and aesthetics. Authors may include Burke, Wollstonecraft, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Smith, Barbauld, Blake, Austen, Keats, Percy and Mary Shelley, Byron, and Hemans.

(Spring) Modern British Poetry - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This introduction to modern British poetry pays special attention to the emergence, consolidation, and dismantling of modernist poetry and poetics. It will link this literary history with, amongst other things, the loss of faith, the two world wars, and the relationship between monumental aesthetics, utopian poetics, and totalitarian politics. Writers will include Hardy, Yeats, Eliot, H.D., and Auden.

(Spring) Modern Irish Literature - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will introduce students to the literature of modern Ireland beginning with Swift, moving through the nineteenth century, examining the Irish Literary Revival and Irish modernism, and finally contemporary drama, poetry, and fiction. We will focus on Irish women writers and their literary interventions concerning colonial history, nationalism, and Unionism. We will pay particular attention to representations of Irishness, the relationship between literature and national history, and questions of violence and representation. The course will explore how the genres, styles, and forms of Irish writing are determined by the experience of colonial trauma and the imperative to imagine national identity.

(Fall) Novels of the Later Eighteenth Century: Worthy Hearts and Saucy Wits
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 204WH)
Eighteenth-century England witnessed the birth of the novel, a genre that in its formative years was both lauded for its originality and condemned as intellectually and morally dangerous, especially for young women. We will trace the numerous prose genres that influenced early novelists, including conduct manuals, epistolary writing, conversion narratives, travelogues, romance, and the gothic. In doing so, we will concomitantly examine the novel's immense formal experimentation alongside debates about developing notions of gender and class as well as the feeling, thinking individual. Authors may include Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Walpole, Burney, and others.

(Fall) Writing Historical Fiction - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Does historical fiction offer readers something history books cannot? What obligation does the writer of historical fiction have to the verifiable facts of the past? Is history a place we can visit, or is it a living force, defining the present? Isn't there a sense in which all fiction is historical fiction? In this course we'll consider these and other questions as we read and write historical fiction. We'll go out with our shovels and teaspoons to dig in the past, unearthing the psychological atmosphere, the gossip, the voices, and the important lies that will show us the way to breathe new life into the cold, dead facts of history.

(Spring) Studies in Journalism: Narrative Nonfiction
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Exceptional works of nonfiction will guide us as we weigh the challenges of building energetic narratives out of small mountains of facts. Story development, research, structure, "voice," and the translation of specialized language into accessible prose will be our focus throughout. Students will read widely, dipping into the best work now in print; yet the core endeavor will be to produce two original works of nonfiction at magazine length. Workshops, peer-edits and individual meetings will help students move toward powerful writing aimed to shape --and perhaps even reshape - readers' understanding of a corner of the world.

In this course we will read and discuss short stories written by living masters of the form. We will not speculate about the meaning of the work or the author's intent, rather we will read as writers, noting and comparing each author's decisions about voice, diction, syntax, image, metaphor, and tone that, within the narrow confines of this challenging form, bring a world into being. In addition students will undertake various exercises culminating in a short story of their own. Class presentations, short papers, and original fiction constitute the graded material for this course. Authors will include Margaret Atwood, Andrea Barrett, Sabina Murray, Andrea Lee and Jhumpa Lahiri.

(Fall) Studies in Renaissance Literature: Trauma in the Premodern World
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
When told that his wife's madness cannot be cured, Macbeth asks: "Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?" Although the term "trauma" was not used to describe a psychological state until the nineteenth century, Macbeth's query suggests that premodern subjects both understood and experienced the sorts of psychic injury the term denotes. This course will explore how trauma was discerned, expressed and represented in premodern European culture. Readings will include contemporary theoretical explorations of trauma, as well as works by Shakespeare, Marlowe, Aphra Behn, and Daniel Defoe.

(Spring) Studies in Renaissance Literature: Early Modern Drama - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Theatre Arts 334EA)
"All the world's a stage." This course surveys the era of literary history that invented this powerful idea. The drama of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is a drama obsessively self-conscious, bursting with disguises, confidence tricks, cross-dressers, rituals, masques, and plays-within-plays. Reading Shakespeare as well as his rivals and peers (Marlowe, Jonson, Webster, and others), we will consider how theater, and the idea of theater, illuminates such concepts as desire, evil, gender, and ideology. Plays will likely include Titus Andronicus, Doctor Faustus, The Alchemist, and The Duchess of Malfi.

Prerequisites: English 200 and English 210 or 211

Instructors: S. Roychoudhury
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-317-10 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Studies in Renaissance Literature: Marlowe, Jonson, Middleton
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

A seminar on three major early modern dramatists--Christopher Marlowe, Ben Jonson, and Thomas Middleton--focusing on the range of genres, characters, conflicts, and aspirations explored in their plays. These playwrights, along with their contemporary Shakespeare, shaped the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century theatre into a site for performing authority and conquest, national and individual identity, trickery and carnival, desire and sexuality, and complex unfoldings of revenge. Readings of two or three plays by each of the three dramatists will be supplemented by recent studies of early modern theatricality.

Prerequisites: Juniors and seniors; 200 and 210 or 211.
Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

(Fall) The Renaissance: Literature and Science in the Renaissance - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course explores the interplay between literary art and scientific thinking in the period held as the dawn of modernity, in which the distinction between such terms as "art" and "science" was anything but clear. Reading the works of prominent poets and dramatists (Shakespeare, Jonson, Donne, Milton) alongside scientific and philosophical literature (Lucretius, Montaigne, Bacon, Burton) we will ponder the relation between aesthetic and empirical paths to truth. Topics will include the anatomical body, faculties of mind, illness and healing, matter and spirit, animals and plants, navigation, alchemy, and magic.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, English 200 and English 210 or 211

(Spring) The Victorian Novel - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course will explore the project of realism in the Victorian novel, watching tensions between a desire for guidance and a desire for mimesis. One critic has said the Victorians brought a sense of social duty to Romantic world-awareness, creating a "duty of awareness" that was almost overwhelming for the novelist and novel. We will explore this "duty of awareness" as we investigate representations of gender, class, and feeling as structuring principles in the novel. Novelists may include Dickens, Eliot, Gaskell, C. Bronte, and Hardy. Supplementary readings in literary criticism and theory.

(Fall) Seminar in the Literature of the Romantic Period: William Wordsworth - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
William Wordsworth lived through a time of revolutions and world wars: the American Revolution, the French Revolution, the Haitian Revolution, the rise and fall of Napoleon, wars of independence and of imperial conquest, and, behind it all the social transformations arising from the industrial revolution. As Wordsworth wrestled with how to adapt his art to these new realities, he introduced dramatically new content and experimented with a startling variety of poetic forms, styles, and techniques. In the end his main subject became the question of how individual identity is formed. This course will be an introduction to Wordsworth's poetry, showing why he is the first and greatest modern English poet.

(Fall) Multicultural London: 1950-2015
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
This course explores how London has emerged as a rich site of literature and popular culture, a multicultural contact zone drawing writers and filmmakers to the metropolitan center of the former imperial Empire. It focuses on Britain's more recent experience of migration, displacement, and transplantation. The course examines how contemporary writers investigate the meaning of "Englishness," along with their own vexed relation to British history and identity. Authors include Sam Selvon, V.S. Naipaul, Salman Rushdie, Hanif Kureishi, Andrea Levy, Zadie Smith, Caryl Phillips, and Neel Mukherjee. Films include My Beautiful Laundrette, My Son the Fanatic, and Anita and Me.

(Spring) The Visual Culture of Protest
(Africana Studies 339)
This course examines social protests from the perspective of the visual. Examining cultural productions from 1948-2015 we will focus on the geographical specificity of planned and spontaneous protests that have mobilized people into action. We will use a black studies framework to engage the possibilities present in resisting disparate power structures of race, gender, sexuality, class, and region. Artists, musicians, activists, writers, and grassroots organizers of social movements have been ever cognizant of the role of the visual in subverting power structures. We will use this opportunity to place visual culture at the center of a conversation concerning resistance, human rights, political agency, citizenship, and freedom.

(Spring) American Literature III
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course explores the range and variety of American literary expression from the 1920s through the early 1940s. Topics include the role of regionalism, the emergence of a "modernist" aesthetic; ethnicity and modernism; debates within African American literary culture. Authors include Ernest Hemingway, F. Scott Fitzgerald, William Faulkner, Zora Neale Hurston, Richard Wright, Henry Roth, and Pietro Di Donato.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in English or permission instructor
Instructors: C. Benfey
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-347-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Modern Urban British Novel - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
As London and the British novel enter the new millennium, both are sites of competing histories, traditions, and agendas. This course will map the city's progress from the center of an empire to a node in the global world's economy, and chart the twentieth-century novel's movement from realism to postmodernism and beyond. Beginning by contrasting the realist London of Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes with Virginia Woolf's modernist version in Mrs. Dalloway, we will go on to trace the development of the post-1945 British novel.
Prerequisites: jr, sr; 8 credits in department including English 200
Notes: meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: N. Alderman
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-349-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Cosmopolitanism - *Not offered this year/term
"Nothing human can be alien to me." Taking its cue from Terence's maxim, and focusing on works of contemporary transnational literature, this seminar explores the idea of "cosmopolitanism." Can there be such a thing as global citizenship, a set of values or commitments that transcend local particulars and instead emphasize universality? How does cosmopolitanism square with nationhood and global mobility? What in particular constitutes literary cosmopolitanism? To find our way through these questions, we will read fiction and non-fiction from the Caribbean, Africa, South Asia, and East Asia, as well as philosophical and theoretical texts. Authors may include Achebe, Naipaul, Goetzee, and Desai.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, English 200 and 4 English credits in post-1900 literature
Instructors: S. Roychoudhury
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-351-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Fall) Sex, Race, and the Visual
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines categories of race, gender, sex, and sexuality through the lens of the visual. Using contemporary literature, photography, performance art, film, and theories of the visual, our task is to investigate the import and utility of embodiment. How do race, gender, and sexuality function in the artistic imaginary? What can we glean from cultural productions that engage the viewer/reader in ways that challenge ideas about conformity, fluidity, belonging, and self-reflection? More than a linear literary or theoretical trajectory, this course will provide a template for all the mechanisms of the visual—psychological and ocular, interpretive, rhetorical and performative.
Prerequisites: English 200
Instructors: K. Brown
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-373-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Fall) Women in American Literature: "Desperate Housewives" in 19th- through early 20th-century American Literature - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will explore visual and literary images of nineteenth through early 20th-century marriage and motherhood. Discussion of Virginia's Woolf's "A Room of One's Own" and Barbara Welter's essay "The Cult of True Womanhood" will serve as the springboard for our focus on representations of women in the home. We will incorporate a visit to the art museum, and will analyze film adaptations of some of the texts we read. The course will focus primarily on American literature, film, and art, with the exception of Ibsen's A Doll's House; selected written texts will include works by writers such as Hawthorne, James, Stowe, Gilman, Freeman, Chopin, Hurston, and Wharton.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits from the department or permission of instructor
Notes: meets English department 1700-1900 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: L. Glasser
Expected enrollment: 15
(Spring) Nature and Gender: Representations of Women and Nature in American Literature (Nineteenth-Twentieth Century) - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333MM and Environmental Studies 373WN)
This course will focus on portrayals of women in nineteenth through mid-twentieth century America, particularly in the context of nature and landscape. We will explore how women, often objectified in visual images of the period, appropriated established devices or developed new images and structures to represent womanhood in their own terms. Texts will include selected poetry, sketches, autobiographical essays or memoirs, short stories, novels, paintings, films, and photography.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits from the department or permission of instructor
Notes: meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: L. Glasser
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-374-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Hitchcock and After - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 320HA)
This course will examine the films of Alfred Hitchcock and the afterlife of Hitchcock in contemporary U.S. culture. We will interpret Hitchcock films in a variety of theoretical frames, including feminist and queer theories, and in shifting historical contexts, including the Cold War. We will also devote substantial attention to the legacy of Hitchcock in remakes, imitations, and parodies. Hitchcock films may include Spellbound, Strangers on a Train, Rear Window, Vertigo, North by Northwest, Psycho, The Man Who Knew Too Much, Marnie, and The Birds; additional works by Brooks, Craven, and De Palma. Readings in film and cultural theory; screenings at least weekly.
Prerequisites: online application required
Notes: meets English Department seminar requirement; film screenings Mondays, 7:00-10:00 pm
Instructors: E. Young
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-381-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Film Melodrama and Horror
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 320MH)
An examination of classic and contemporary works in two important film genres, melodrama and horror. Topics of particular interest: affinities as well as contrasts between genres; feminist analyses and uses of genre; normative and alternative representations of sexualities; genre and the representations of race; spectatorship and the production of affect - tears and screams - by these genres. Extensive readings in film studies and cultural theory.
Directors may include Almodóvar, Cronenberg, Curtiz, DePalma, Hitchcock, Kent, Lee, Onwurah, Polanski, Ray, Romero, Sirk, Vidor, and Whale.
Prerequisites: 4 cr in Film Studies and 4 cr in English, or per i
Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours) and screenings; limited to juniors and seniors; enrollment may be limited, with priority given to English and Film Studies majors
Instructors: E. Young
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-394-01 - English - 2015-2016
(Spring) Advanced Topics in English: Aesthetics of Waste
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Is beauty useless, or does art serve a purpose? With the rise of literacy, accessibility, and democratization post-industrialization, this question gained new political and economic valence. This course combines readings in aesthetic philosophy with literary works to investigate art in a society of consumption. Does art merely preserve the old or can it disrupt economies of sufficiency? We will look at the politics of representation in the Western tradition that privileges certain bodies and ignores others. We will also interrogate the process of interpretation itself as it relates to the preservation of cultural products. Readings from Symbolism, Decadence, Modernism, and contemporary texts.
Prerequisites: English 200
Notes: Meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: S. Branson
Expected enrollment: 15

Environmental Studies

ENVST-100-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Introduction to Environmental Studies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course introduces students to the field of environmental studies and to some of the scientific, historical, political, economic and cultural aspects of environmental concerns. Through interdisciplinary lenses, we explore the complexities of many issues and problems such as climate change, threats to biodiversity, and toxic environments. In addition to fostering an understanding of their origins, the course focuses on potential solutions.
Instructors: T. Farnham
Expected enrollment: 48

ENVST-104-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Renewable Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement (Physics 104)
We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.
Instructors: A. Arango
Expected enrollment: 40

ENVST-200-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Environmental Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Most of the environmental challenges we face are complex and interdisciplinary in nature. This course introduces students to the scientific principles, concepts, and methodologies required to both understand the interrelationships of the natural world, as well as to identify and analyze environmental problems and think critically about alternative solutions for addressing them. Key concepts from ecology, biogeochemistry, and other scientific fields inform our study of climate change, water resources, soil sustainability, food production, and other topics. Fundamental and emerging issues are examined using regional case studies, hands-on problem solving, and field and laboratory experiments.
Prerequisites: One 100-level lab science; one course in statistics is recommended
Instructors: J. Albertine
Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department | 02 LAB The department |
Expected enrollment: 24

ENVST-210-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Political Ecology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course will explore the historical, political, economic, social, and cultural contexts in which human-environment interactions occur. We will cover critical topics and trends in the field of political ecology, from its early manifestations to more recent expansions. Using case studies from the global south and north, we will discuss factors that shape social and environmental change across scales from the personal to the global, and we will examine the role of gender, race, class, and power in struggles over resources. Students will become familiar with the academic debates in which political ecologists are engaged, and they will apply the concepts discussed in a case of their choice.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Instructors: C. Corson
Expected enrollment: 30

ENVST-222-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Evolution of North American Landscapes - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Earth's landscapes have changed dramatically over the planet's long history. In this course we tour North America and explore the origin and anatomy of its landscapes, including national parks and monuments. We also consider how geologic setting or physical environment has influenced human exploration and settlement of the continent. By "reading" the land we can recognize the complex layering of natural and cultural histories that creates what is experienced as "sense of place." Reading the land can also provide a clearer sense of how various peoples have used and shaped Earth's surface differently, and how these differences have contributed to a spectrum of environmental impacts.

Prerequisites: permission of instructor. High school earth science or 4 credits in geology recommended.

Instructors: L. Savoy

Expected enrollment: 15

ENVST-233-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016

(Spring) Topics in Environmental Studies: Air Pollution Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

Humans are increasing the amount of pollutants in the environment, particularly through the burning of fossil fuels and other industrial practices. This course will investigate the pollutants that cycle through the atmosphere. Key pollutants covered will include nitrogen oxides, sulfur oxides, carbon compounds, particulate matter, mercury, and ozone. We will investigate where the pollutants come from, their presence in the environment, and the biological effects of these pollutants. This course will be largely lecture based, but group discussions of primary scientific literature and case studies will be core components. Field trip outside class time to MA DEP air pollution-monitoring site.

Prerequisites: 100 level Chemistry and 100 level Biological Science or permission of instructor.

Instructors: J. Albertine

Expected enrollment: 24

ENVST-240-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016

(Fall) The Value of Nature - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Through this seminar, students develop an in-depth knowledge of and articulate vocabulary for the significant and diverse ways that humans value the natural world - utilitarian, scientific, aesthetic, naturalistic, symbolic, ethical, and spiritual. We use these different typologies of human environmental values as frameworks for readings and discussion, extending our examination to historical and cultural variations in values, competing perspectives of the natural world, and other value concepts, including intrinsic and transformative value. We examine the concept of biophilia and probe the role values play in the concern over losses of biological diversity and its implications.

Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 100

Notes: gateway course for minor in conceptual foundations of science

Instructors: T. Farnham

Expected enrollment: 15

ENVST-241-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016

(Spring) Environmental Issues

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

In this course, we will explore the different facets of numerous environmental policy issues and review the substantive aspects, legal themes, and regulatory structure of the major federal environmental laws. The laws covered in this course include the National Environmental Policy Act, the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Endangered Species Act, and others. The course objectives are for the student to learn the basic regulatory characteristics of the major laws and to become well-versed in the current environmental issues which we will focus upon throughout the semester, such as global climate change, ocean degradation, energy resources, and biodiversity loss.

Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 100

Instructors: T. Farnham

Expected enrollment: 18

(Fall) Research Methods in History, Environmental Change, and Public Health

(History 257)

An introduction to interdisciplinary research methods in history, social science, and the digital humanities, using conceptions of nature, environmental change, and public health as themes for investigation. Topics include the collection, organization, and analysis of information from databases, printed materials, and research notes, as well as bibliographic management. Computer-assisted analysis of textual information and GIS will be introduced to study agricultural change, industrialization, urbanization, and their impacts on public health during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in Europe and the United States.

Prerequisites: so,jr,sr or permission of instructor

Instructors: R. Schwartz

Expected enrollment: 20

ENVST-267-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016

(Fall) Reading and Writing in the World

(English 267)

An introduction to reading and writing about nature, this seminar will attempt an exchange across distinct approaches to observing and describing the world around us. Do lenses of culture, discipline, and gender determine how we see and experience nature, environment, and place? Course work will include reading such authors as N. Scott Momaday, Henry David Thoreau, bell hooks, Leslie Marmon Silko, Mary Oliver, Terry Tempest Williams, Wendell Berry, and Annie Dillard; field trips; and writing assignments—weekly field notes and journals, analytical papers, and personal essays.

Prerequisites: You must apply for admission to this course by completing the online application form.

(Fall) History of Energy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; History 301HE)
We live in an age of energy crises, in which the future of energy is questioned in countless headlines and Twitter feeds. Often our energy agony accompanies other assumptions about energy’s past, in particular the idea that social change invariably follows the discovery of new energy technologies. From food to fuel cells, this colloquium charts a more complicated and interesting history, a history in which people have continually shaped and made meaningful the energies that fuel the modern world. It will be of particular interest to students in history and environmental studies and to those interested in the social study of science and technology.
Instructors: D. Fitz-Gibbon

(Fall) Research, Ethics and Policy in Environmental Studies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Designed to promote curriculum-to-career, this hands-on course prepares students for independent research, research internships, or research careers. Student pick topics of interest and share weekly assignments. Over the course of the semester, we examine methods for designing research and for gathering and analyzing information, and we discuss using data to inform policy. We speak with Mount Holyoke alumnae who have conducted research during internships, for honors theses and independent study, or for policy institutes after graduating. Finally, we consider ethical issues, from gendered experiences to cross-cultural research, and students prepare institutional review board proposals. Students from various disciplines are welcome.
Prerequisites: 8 credits of 200 level social science or humanities courses. Meets the ES politics and policy and environment and development concentration requirements
Instructors: C. Corson
Expected enrollment: 15

ENVST-316-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Restoration Ecology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Community-based learning course)
A key test of our ecological knowledge is whether we can successfully apply it to create or restore ecosystems that have been damaged or destroyed. As we take on the role of restoration ecologists this semester, we will use principles and methods of ecology, conservation biology, hydrology, soil science, and related disciplines to learn about the theory, practice, and politics of ecosystem restoration. This course emphasizes fieldwork, interdisciplinary teamwork, and ecological planning to evaluate and design restoration projects in our surrounding communities and regional landscapes. On a few occasions, meetings may last until 5:05 pm so that we can go on fieldtrips that are farther from campus.
Prerequisites: Environmental Science 200, at least 8 credits of 200 or 300-level laboratory science, or permission of the instructor.
Instructors: K. Ballantine
Expected enrollment: 12

ENVST-317-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Perspectives on American Environmental History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
We explore the history of human-environment interactions in North America from precolonial times to the present from different cultural perspectives. How have such human activities as migration, colonization, and resource use depended on or modified the natural world? How have different cultural perceptions of and attitudes toward environment shifted through time and helped to reshape American landscapes? Case studies include ecological histories of Native America and Euro-America, slavery and land use, wilderness and conservation, and environmental racism and social justice. Our approach entails historical review of scientific studies, literature, visual records, and oral tradition.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor
Instructors: L. Savoy
Expected enrollment: 15

ENVST-321-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Conference Course: The Challenges of Feeding Nine Billion People
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Human population is expected to surpass 9 billion in the next century. As our population grows, so will our need for food. Land available to grow food will not increase and degrading environmental conditions will make adequate food production on this land increasingly difficult. We will focus on the challenges to meet the nutritional needs of a growing population as well as look at some of the possible solutions for the future from a scientific standpoint. These challenges/solutions will be investigated at both the world and local (northeast US) scales. In addition to being a heavily science-based class on food security, we will also address issues of food justice and environmental justice.
Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 200, or other 200 level Biological or Plant Science class, or permission of the instructor.
Instructors: J. Albertine
Expected enrollment: 18

ENVST-321-02 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Conference Course: Human Health and Climate Change
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Climate change presents a global public health problem, with serious health impacts predicted to manifest in varying ways in different parts of the world. Through this course, we will investigate these health effects which include increased respiratory and cardiovascular disease, injuries and premature deaths related to extreme heat, weather, and other disaster events, and changes in the prevalence and geographical distribution of food- and waterborne illnesses and other infectious diseases. We will critically review the literature documenting recent and current impacts and predictions for the future. We will also look at solutions in place for adapting to these changes.
Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 200 or permission of the instructor.
Instructors: J. Albertine
Expected enrollment: 18

ENVST-333-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Landscape and Narrative - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Different stories or narratives—whether myth, literature, maps, or scientific theory—have been created about every region or environment on Earth as human attempts to describe and understand our connections with that place. How do braided strands of human history and natural history contribute to stories we tell of the land, and to stories we tell of ourselves in the land and of relational identity? In this reading and writing seminar we will reflect on how lifeways, homeplace, and identity of an individual or a community are linked with environment or the land. We will also create written and visual narratives of our own and explore creative environmental writing in reflection and action.
Prerequisites: jr., sr., permission of instructor
Instructors: L. Savoy
Expected enrollment: 15

ENVST-335-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Wetlands Ecology and Management - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Although they cover ~0.6% of the earth's surface, wetlands perform more ecosystem services per hectare than any other ecosystem type. Alarming, over half of the earth's wetlands have been lost to agriculture and development. With these wetlands were also lost the valuable ecosystem functions wetlands perform. This course takes an interdisciplinary approach to examine the biogeochemical, ecological, societal, and regulatory aspects of wetland ecosystems. Group discussion of primary scientific literature, as well as independent experimental design and the writing of a research proposal are core components. Field trips will sometimes keep us until 5:05 pm, and will provide an opportunity to explore these fascinating ecosystems in person.
Prerequisites: Environmental Science 200, at least 8 credits of 200 or 300-level laboratory science, or permission of the instructor.
Instructors: K. Ballantine
Expected enrollment: 12
ENVST-337-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Interdisciplinary Perspectives on Environment and Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course will engage students in interdisciplinary thinking about the dynamic relationship between environment and development. Focusing on specific case studies, we will consider complementary and contrasting perspectives about the causes of and solutions to global poverty and environmental degradation. We will examine how development theories and practices have changed over time, and we will reflect on how our assumptions shape what we "see" in specific sites, how we frame particular problems and what we suggest as solutions. The course is designed as a curriculum-to-career course in which students build practical skills and professional contacts for international development careers.
Prerequisites: jr, sr.

ENVST-341-01 - Environmental Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Science and Power in Environmental Governance
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course applies concepts from political ecology to study how governance, broadly defined, works in relation to the environment. Using case studies of international environmental issues, we will explore how people make decisions about the environment in a policy realm. We will discuss the role of various agents, such as governments, scientific bodies, and nongovernmental organizations, in the decision-making process. We will reflect on who has access to decisions; how scientific data is used; how environmental ideas become powerful; and how policies are legitimated. Armed with this information, we will consider how to advocate for global environmental sustainability and social equity.

Film Studies

FLMST-201-01 - Film Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introduction to Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course teaches the basic concepts, vocabulary, and critical skills involved in interpreting film. Through readings and lectures, students will become more informed and sophisticated observers of the cinema, key examples of which will be screened weekly. While the focus will be on the form and style of narrative film, documentary and avant-garde practices will be introduced. The class will also touch upon some of the major theoretical approaches in the field.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 screening (2 1/2 hours)
Instructors: R. Blaetz
Expected enrollment: 40

FLMST-202-01 - Film Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Talking Pictures: An Introduction to Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Art History 202)
Some of the best feature-length films of the past century have commanded our attention because of their compelling artistry and the imaginative ways they tell stories visually and verbally. This course closely studies narrative films from around the world, from the silent era to the present, and in the process it introduces students to the basic elements of film form, style, and narration. Some of the films to be considered are: Broken Blossoms, Battleship Potemkin, Citizen Kane, Contempt, The Bicycle Thief, Ugetsu, Rear Window, Woman in the Dunes, The Marriage of Maria Braun, Days of Heaven, and Moulin Rouge.
Instructors: P. Staiti

(Fall) Introduction to Spanish and Latin American Cinema
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 240CN)
This course offers a broad introduction to the history, politics, and aesthetics of Latin American and Spanish cinema in the context of, and in contrast with, cinemas from other regions, especially hegemonic Hollywood aesthetics. This course will also focus specifically on introducing students to the basic terminology and methodologies of film analysis, thus preparing them for the department's film seminar (Spanish 320) and other advanced courses in film studies.
Prerequisites: Spanish 212 or permission of instructor
Notes: Taught in Spanish
Instructors: J. Crumbaugh
Expected enrollment: 16

FLMST-210-01 - Film Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Production Seminar in the Moving Image: Beginning Video Production
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course provides a foundation in the principles, techniques, and equipment involved in video production. Students will make several short videos over the course of the term as well as one final piece. We will develop our own voices while learning the vocabulary of moving images and gaining production and post-production skills. In addition to technical training, classes will include critiques, screenings, readings, and discussion.
Prerequisites: Introduction to Film Studies. Application and permission of instructor required. Application available through Film Studies Web site.
Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours), 1 screening (2 hours); a lab fee may be charged
Instructors: B. Mellis
Expected enrollment: 12

FLMST-220-01 - Film Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Screenwriting: The Shape of Stories
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The screenplay is a unique and ephemeral form that exists as a blueprint for something else: a finished film. How do you convey on the page a story that will take shape within an audio-visual medium? The screenwriter must have an understanding of both the language of narrative film as well as the general shape and mechanics of film stories. This course will analyze both the language of film and the shape of film stories by looking at two modes of writing that are often at odds with each other: the three-act screenwriting as exemplified by Hollywood and the more elastic possibilities of the so-called "art film."

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Music and Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Music 220)
This course is for all who stay to the end of the credits, purchase soundtracks, and argue over who should have won the Oscar for Best Score, along with anyone else interested in the undervalued importance of music to the general effect of a motion picture. We will explore and discuss the myriad ways in which these two media interact. The course will focus on classic scores by Herrmann, Morricone, and Williams, as well as the uses of pre-existing music in films of Kubrick and Tarantino.
Prerequisites: Music 100, 102, 103, or 131 or permission of instructor

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Representing the Holocaust in Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231RH)
To mark the seventieth anniversary of the end of World War II, this seminar explores the impact of films depicting the European Holocaust from the first encounter between the liberators and the survivors up to the present day. We analyze the global contexts in which the films came into being and the changing reception of the films with the advent of digital distribution. With a focus on less well-known films from newly distributed archival footage and more recent documentaries made by second- and third-generation children of survivors and perpetrators, we examine issues such as the precarious relationship between memory and history and the ethics of filming the dead and individuals in pain.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Notes: Students may consult with the instructor about taking this course for 300-level credit. Component course in Film Studies. Students wishing to receive credit in German Studies also must sign up for GRMST-295-02 Independent Study for 2 credits with Karen Remmler. This 2-credit addition will serve as the German discussion section for this course, time to be arranged. Contact Professor Remmler for permission.

(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231F-02)
Focus on the discussion and analysis of films by German women directors from Lotte Reiniger, pioneer of animation films, and Leni Riefenstahl, controversial director and mythmaker of the Third Reich, to such trailblazing women directors of the New German Cinema as Margarethe von Trotta, Jutta Brückner, and Helma Sanders-Brahms. Moreover, we will attempt to determine whether more recent women directors like Doris Dörrie or Caroline Link, including those of migration background like Yasemin Sarınler, developed special (trans)gendered and transnational gazes that led them to focus so frequently on variations of (trag)comedy in film.

(Spring) Special Topics in Film Studies: Adaptation from Page to Screen - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 284)
The Oxford English Dictionary lists as its primary definition for "adaptation": "the bringing of two things together so as to effect a change in the nature of the objects." Our course considers the complex relationship between a source and its retellings, including the way in which such retellings permanently alter the source material and how each incarnation of a given narrative offers us a window of insight into a particular historical moment.
Readings/films will include Macbeth, Frankenstein, The Silence of the Lambs, and No Country for Old Men.

(Spring) Documentary Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines the history, theory, and practice of the genre called Documentary Film. Between studying the "actualités" of the cinema's first practitioners and the self-reflexive postmodern works of contemporary filmmakers such as Errol Morris, we will investigate ethnographic film, cinema verité, direct cinema, activist media, personal essay films, docudramas, and "mockumentaries." We will examine the formal structures through which these films make meaning and explore theoretical questions concerning notions of truth, ethics, and politics.
Prerequisites: Film Studies 201 or 202

(Spring) History of World Cinema Through 1960
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course offers an historical survey of the cinema as a developing art form and a means of communication. We will examine the history of this international medium from its 19th-century beginnings through the mid-20th century. The national and thematic focus of the course shifts through the semester. For example, we will focus on U.S. film in studying the earliest developments in film technology and narrative, and on Soviet and French films to study the formal and social experimentation of the 1920s. The course provides a background for understanding film history and pursuing further studies in the field.
Prerequisites: Film Studies 201, 202 or 203 or Art History 202
Instructors: R. Blaetz

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231HG)
Germans have no sense of humor, right? Yet preeminent cultural critic Marcel Reich-Ranicki claims that, next to England, no other country demonstrates a cultural tradition as deeply steeped in humor and comedy. Who is right? Are Germans humorless robots or born with funny bones? We will challenge the notion of humor as a universal concept and examine the comic as a cultural phenomenon, tracing its changes from Goethe's erotic poetry to Lubitsch's gender-confirming Weimar film comedies to today's "immigrant" film comedies like Fatih Akin's SOUL KITCHEN or Rebel Comedy TV and Susanna Salonen's 2014 Filmpreis movie PATONG GIRL, a favorite at the North German Film Festival 2015.
Notes: NO KNOWLEDGE OF GERMAN NECESSARY. Counts as a film studies component course. Contact instructor if conflict with announced SCREENING time. For German Studies credit and language D, German Studies 232 MUST be completed and all written work for 231 must be completed in German.

(Fall) Film Theory: Cinema and the City
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.
This course offers an historical survey of film theory, from the work of its earliest authors and practitioners at the birth of the 20th century (who first struggled to define the medium), to those who are working still to elucidate the place of the cinema in relation to new media in its ever-evolving and ever more complex place in culture. As a way of focusing the discussion of the various theoretical positions, we will watch and discuss films that represent that most modern of phenomena—the city.

(Philosophy 275)
Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.
An exploration of philosophical issues encountered in the study of film. Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? These are examples of the topics to be discussed in this course as we investigate the nature of film and its relation to philosophy. There will be weekly required film screenings.

(Spring) Production Seminar: Advanced Projects in Video Production
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): In this class, students will take the skills and insights gained in introductory production courses and, working individually or in pairs, develop them over the length of the semester through the creation of one short project, 10 minutes long. Students may choose to work in narrative, documentary, experimental, or hybrid forms.
We will learn by making work as well as by researching, reading, and watching films related to our projects. We will begin with brainstorming, research, script or documentary proposal writing, and pre-production. Each student will develop a script or in-depth proposal to begin. As we move into production, we will review and deepen our knowledge of camera, lighting, sound, and editing principles and techniques. We will move between production and post-production in the second half of the semester, first developing sequences, then rough cuts and fine cuts, before ultimately completing our final cut.
Prerequisites: Film Studies 210 or its equivalent. Application and permission of instructor required. Application available through Film Studies Web site.
Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours), 1 screening (2 hours); a lab fee may be charged.

Many critics considered Kathryn Bigelow’s Zero Dark Thirty to be the best film of 2012, but it was also widely criticized for seeming to promote torture.

Movies can be morally dangerous, seemingly endorsing or even promoting immoral or discriminatory ideals, or romanticizing immoral characters and behavior, as in Hannibal Lecter from Silence of the Lambs (Thomas Harris, 1991). In this course, we evaluate the arguments given for treating certain movies as immoral, and we examine whether and how our moral evaluations of movies should affect us. When, if ever, are movies immoral? Should certain movies be censored? Should we withhold praise from morally objectionable movies?

Component course for Film Studies. In this course we go behind the scenes and behind the screens of anthropological films, museum exhibitions, "small media" events such as television, and publications such as National Geographic Magazine, to explore the social contexts of image production, distribution, and interpretation. Focusing on visual activism and ethics, we consider how popular portrayals of our own society and of others' both shape and are shaped by hierarchies of value in the material world. Finally, we leave the walls of the classroom to produce home movies of places which others call home - workplaces, temporary shelters, artistic environments, and so forth.

(Spring) Film Genre: Expired Horror? - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific film genre. Some examples of genres that might be studied are: the science fiction, horror, melodrama, musical, Western, detective, or gangster film.

The horror film stands at the core of the body genres; however, in 2013 it may be hard for us to experience visceral impact from films made at a time that, in some ways, looked so different from our own. This course will survey the genre from 1896 to 1968, the year that the rating system was introduced in the United States. Yet our scope will be international, tackling not only Hollywood's Universal Horror, but the UK's Hammer Horror, Mexican Horror, Les yeux sans visage (1960), Italy's Mario Bava, and precursors to J-Horror.

(Art History 360BC, Asian Studies 360BC)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

How are we to respond to Indian popular film, which is notorious for its distracting song and dance numbers, meandering story line, and visually overblown spectacles? This seminar will develop historical and theoretical approaches to Indian films as what scholar Lalitha Gopalan calls a "constellation of interruptions." Students will examine feature films in class, write critical papers on scholarly essays, and pursue independent research projects on various aspects of Indian film.

(Spring) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Surging Cinema: Costa Rica and the Latin American New Waves

(Writing-intensive; Spanish 340CR)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures.

Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course studies the emergence of a new kind of cinematography in Costa Rica within the larger context of Latin American cinema's "new waves."

First, students will view and discuss several recent Latin American films in order to identify broader trends throughout the region. The focus will then turn to the specifics of a nascent brand of Costa Rican cinema that distinguishes itself from those of other Latin American countries through a unique aesthetic linked to the conditions from which they have emerged. The course will also explore how recent Costa Rican films' stylistic features address issues such as national identity.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; German Studies 315BK)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures.

Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course studies selected filmmakers from Weimar to the present who have filmed literary texts and evoked the wrath of the censors: Sternberg's Blue Angel, H. Mann's Professor Unrat with Dietrich as the New Woman; Dudow/Brecht's Proletarian film, Kuhle Wampe, censored for including an abortion; Szabó's 1981 film of Klaus Mann's 1936 novel Mptfeits, banned to protect actor Gustav Gründgens from a questionable Third Reich past. Also, works by Kleist, Storm, Fontane, Hesse, Kafka, and Thomas Mann inspired filmmakers like Fassbinder, Huntgeburth, and Haneke, not only because they broke existing taboos but also by foregrounding current issues such as globalization, alienation, terrorism, and homophobia.

(Latina/o Studies 335)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures.

Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This seminar offers an interrogation of the ways in which Latinas and Latinos are represented in the cinema. We will explore early portrayals of Latinas and Latinos in film history and then explore contemporary cinema with a focus on race, class, gender and sexuality in these representations. Employing multiple aesthetic and disciplinary approaches we will analyze commercial films alongside independent films with particular attention to the market-driven and political mandates of these projects. We will focus on films by both Latina/o filmmakers and non-Latina/o filmmakers interrogating the multifarious points of entry of these artists.

(Writing-intensive; English 345HG)

Preamble (for topics courses): Film Studies 380 offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific cinematic author. While most courses focus on a director or group of directors, courses may also focus on designers, technicians, performers, producers, or some combination of these personnel.

This seminar will examine the various screen adaptations of assorted novels by Henry James. We will read the novels against the films, exploring how James's texts translate—or do not translate—into film.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): The usual periodization of French literature and culture is by century. Some period courses focus on the characteristics of specific centuries. Others focus on artistic or intellectual movements: gothic, Renaissance, romantic. All period courses, whatever their conceptual framework, integrate texts and historical contexts. Study of French society, politics, literature, film, and visual arts between the two world wars as markers of France’s complex relationship to the modern world: How did the optimism of les années folles evolve into the repression of the Vichy era? What was the role of the writer and artist in France’s changing political and social climate? How did gender, race, ethnic, and class differences mark the period? What issues still resonate today? Authors may include: Cocteau, Breton, Colette, Weil, Beauvoir, Sartre, Césaire, Brasillach, Némirovsky, de Gaulle; plus films: Un chien andalou, L’Atalante, Regain, Princesse Tam Tam, La règle du jeu.

Others focus on artistic or intellectual movements: gothic, Renaissance, romantic. All period courses, whatever their conceptual framework, integrate texts and historical contexts.

Hugo's epic masterpiece, written in exile, has everything: ceaseless adventures, crimes and punishments, love, hate, obsession, heroes, villains, the battle of Waterloo, and civil war. The sympathetic everyman, Jean Valjean, condemned to hard labor for stealing bread and relentlessly pursued by the pitiless policeman Javert, encounters unforgettable characters. We will examine how Hugo situates Valjean’s escapes within a framework of social injustice and good triumphing over evil, balancing his political and romantic ideas. Reading, discussion, film screenings.

(Spring) Seminar in Romance Languages and Cultures: The Mind of the Traveler: Journeys, Expeditions, Tours

(Taught in English; Spanish 360MT, Italian 361MT, Romance Language & Literature 375MT)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student’s choice.

Travel literature has always been a precious source for the study of culture, politics, arts and, last but not least, people. From Tacitus to Marzo Polo, from Stendhal to Camilo Jose Cela, we will read and discuss authors who traveled for political, personal, and recreational reasons. We will also pay special attention to tales of emigration and immigration in the third millennium.

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French must read texts and write papers in French to receive credit. This is a multimedia course where students achieve digital literacy. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in LRC.

(Spring) Courses on Social and Political Issues and Critical Approaches: Writing and Politics: Literature as Social Engagement - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses examine a definable phenomenon—an idea, a movement, an event, a mentality, a cultural structure or system, an historical problem, a critical mode—relevant to the civilization of France or of French-speaking countries. Readings from a variety of disciplines shed light on the particular aspect of thought or culture being studied.

Study of French and Francophone writers, filmmakers, and artists, in their specific contexts, whose works engage with important political and social issues of their time and place. Preliminary readings theorize how texts can communicate, explicitly or implicitly, an ideological stance. We will then consider imaginative works, from the Middle Ages to the present, whose thematic, narrative, cinematic, stylistic, or linguistic techniques connect with movements for social or cultural change.

Prerequisites: 12 credits including two courses at the advanced level, or permission of department chair and course instructor

Notes: 1 meeting (2 hours, 50 minutes)

(Spring) Courses in Francophone Studies: Topic: Ousmane Sembène: The Work of a Militant Artist
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): These courses study nonmetropolitan French-speaking cultures and literary works written in French outside Europe. Areas of focus are one or more of the following regions: Africa, the Caribbean, or Canada.
Born in 1923 in Senegal, the writer/filmmaker Ousmane Sembène is one of the rare witnesses of the three key periods of contemporary African history: the colonial period; the period of struggle for political and economic independence; and the period of effort to eliminate neocolonialism through the rehabilitation of African cultures. This course is entirely devoted to the works of Ousmane Sembène and will explore the key moments of his life, his activism in European leftist organizations, his discovery of writing, and most of all the dominant features of his film work.
Prerequisites: Two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

(Fall) Courses on Women and Gender: Topic: Viragos, Virgins & Visionaries
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333VR)
Preamble (for topics courses): These courses explore cultural, literary, and social issues relating to women and gender identities in France and French-speaking countries. Topics may include women's writing, writing about women and men, the status of women, feminist criticism, and theories of sexuality and sexual difference.
In this course, we will study the three most celebrated French female saints: Jeanne d'Arc, Thérèse de Lisieux and Bernadette de Lourdes. Their stories are similar: ordinary young women to whom extraordinary things happened, who became symbols of France and inspired a rich verbal and visual iconography. Yet they are profoundly different: Joan was a warrior, Thérèse a memoirist, Bernadette a visionary. We will study the facts of their lives, in their own words and those of others, but also the many fictions, semi-fictions, myths and legends based on those lives. We will analyze a number of films and visual images as well as literary and non-literary texts in our attempt to understand these cases of specifically female, specifically French sainthood.

(Fall) Advanced Level Seminar: Icons of Power, Lust, and Ambition in Pre-Revolutionary France
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): The seminar is intended to challenge students at the highest level. A regular rotation of topics ensures a variety of perspectives across genre and period, encompassing linguistic, literary, theoretical, and cultural issues of French and Francophone studies. Development of critical skills is stressed through classroom discussion and critique of writing projects, drawing on individual student interests and experiences as they relate to the topic of the course.
An examination of powerful female archetypes of 15th, 16th, 17th and 18th centuries. Ambitious, influential women whose legends shaped the traditional cultural mindset of France's Ancien Régime and beyond. Using texts and visual elements (paintings, drawings, contemporary films), we will study how these iconic figures define the image of women in their times and in ours. Warriors, heretics, martyrs, schemers, nymphomaniacs, intellectuals, scientists. Do they constitute a stereotype of the quintessential French woman?

This seminar will address questions of literary censorship in France in the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries. We will read literary texts banned at various moments in history, situate the moments of both their publication and censoring in a historical and literary historical context, and attempt to answer the following fundamental questions: who bans what, when and why? We will examine the explicitly political, religious, and/or sexual thematic content of the texts. We will try to establish distinctions between more textual taboos and those which would appear to be universal. We will view banned films as well.

Critical thinkers from a growing number of disciplines are interrogating the longstanding "human-animal binary," asking difficult and provocative questions about the nature of life and the politics of being. In this course, first-year students will explore "the animal question" from a variety of perspectives, revisiting their own assumptions and experiences as they discover the interspecies networks that constitute the changing environment of Mount Holyoke. Special attention will be paid to the discourse of species as it intersects with other forms of difference. For their final project, students will create and publish an online bestiary of the ecosystems that shape our campus community.

How do scholars produce knowledge? What can we learn from differences and similarities in the research process of a novelist, a biologist, an historian, a sociologist, and a film critic? Who decides what counts as knowledge? We will examine a range of methods from the humanities, social sciences, and natural sciences, including visual analysis, archival exploration, interviewing, and ethnography, as we consider the specific advantages (and potential limitations) of diverse disciplinary approaches for feminist inquiry. We will take up numerous practical questions as well as larger methodological and ethical debates. This course provides a foundation for advanced work in the major.
Prerequisites: Gender Studies 101

Eighteenth-century England witnessed the birth of the novel, a genre that in its formative years was both lauded for its originality and condemned as intellectually and morally dangerous, especially for young women. We will trace the numerous prose genres that influenced early novelists, including conduct manuals, epistolary writing, conversion narratives, travelogues, romance, and the gothic. In doing so, we will concomitantly examine the novel’s immense formal experimentation alongside debates about developing notions of gender and class as well as the feeling, thinking individual.

Authors may include Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Walpole, Burney, and others.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, or sr
Notes: meets English department 1700-1900 requirement

Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China's social changes and the women's movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latina/o Studies 250CU, Latin American Studies 287CU)
This course introduces students to critical and creative works that center Cuba and its diasporas. The primary questions of the course are: How have authors varyingly imagined Cuba over time and across space? How are these imaginings of Cuba politically, economically, and culturally situated? Students will question the personal/national and the public/private across a range of texts that explore issues of exile, nostalgia, memory, and nationalism. Readings include works by Cristina Garcia, Ana Menendez, Pablo Medina, Achy Obejas, Roberto G. Fernandez, Carmelita Tropicana, Richard Blanco, and Rachel Kushner and readings by Gustavo Perez Firmat, Sheila Croucher, and Louis A. Perez, Jr.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 218LT, Latina/o Studies 212)
We will explore a number of readings across different genres (the novel, play, poem, short story, graphic novel). Students will endeavor to understand how each author defines Latinidad. What characterizes Latina/o for each of these writers and how do their works articulate the historical conditions out of which they emerge? How is Latinidad marked by notions of language, nationality, gender, sexuality, class, race, politics, form, and genre? The readings will provide both a survey of general ideas in the study of Latina/o literatures as well as specific case studies and historical examples. The reading list is not meant to be comprehensive but to provide a sampling of texts.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of History: African Women: Food and Power - *Not offered this year/term
(Gender-based learning course; History 296AF)
This course uses archival records, fiction, life histories, and outstanding recent scholarship to investigate African women's actions in a century that encompassed women's loss of agency and authority but the endurance of their responsibility for the production of food. We investigate the erosion of women's economic power and the loss of women's work of governing at conquest, in the early colonial period, and as a consequence of Africa's integration into the world economy as its least powerful player. We examine women's efforts to sustain productive activities in the face of opposition and the gendered tensions these efforts provoke. Optional fourth hour discussions.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of History: Gender and Sexuality in East Asia
(History 239GS, Asian 311GS)
This course explores the political/social meaning of gender and sexuality from the nineteenth century in the East Asian context. What did womanhood mean in neo-Confucian regimes? Why did gender emerge as a significant category in various social discourses, including anarchism, Marxism, and nationalism? How did certain types of women such as "good wives and wise mothers," "sexy modern girls," and "socialist iron women" emerge as (un)desirable models in these societies? How did women become historical agents or social victims during imperialist wars and economic development? We investigate the relationship between gender and ideologies/States/market economies to find our answer.

(Philosophy 249)
This course will focus on topics to which feminist thinking has made important philosophical contributions, such as: pornography, objectification, and consent. We will draw on a variety of philosophical resources, ranging from liberal and feminist political theory, to speech act theory. We will consider questions such as: Is pornography morally problematic? Can sexism or other biases lead to bad science? Is it wrong to choose to be a stay-at-home parent? The goal will be to see how careful philosophical thought can help us with pressing issues of sex and gender.

(Spring) Women and Gender in Philosophy and Religion: Gender and Sexuality in South Asian Religion
(Religion 225SA)
From the erotic asceticism of the god Śiva to the spiritual power of an auspicious married woman, the nexus of gender and sexuality has broadly shaped the practices and philosophies of South Asia's many religious traditions. The central questions guiding this course are: How do Buddhism, Hinduism, and Islam incorporate sexual practice and/or restraint into a vision of ethical life? When does one’s sexuality or gender become dangerous or unethical? In pursuing these questions, students will gain a deep familiarity with South Asian asceticism, the place of erotics within religious discourse, new perspectives on queer and transgender theories, emic feminisms, and sexual ethics.

(Spring) Feminist Theory: Feminist and Queer Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
We will read a number of key feminist texts that theorize sexual difference, and challenge the oppression of women. We will then address queer theory, an offshoot and expansion of feminist theory, and study how it is both embedded in, and redefines, the feminist paradigms. This redefinition occurs roughly at the same time (1980s/90s) when race emerges as one of feminism's prominent blind spots. The postcolonial critique of feminism is a fourth vector we will examine, as well as anti-racist and postcolonial intersections with queerness. We will also study trans-theory and its challenge to the queer paradigm.

(Fall) Feminist Theory: Introduction to Feminist Theory
This course explores the overlapping dualities of the feminine and the masculine, the private and the public, the home and the world. We examine different forms of power over the body; the ways gender and sexual identities reinforce or challenge the established order; and the cultural determinants of "women's emancipation." We emphasize the politics of feminism, dealing with themes that include culture, democracy, and the particularly political role of theory and on theoretical attempts to grasp the complex ties and tensions between sex, gender, and power.

(Spring) The Art of Fact: Writing the Lives of Women - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This course will examine narrative non-fiction biographies written by women biographers in order to determine the specific ways in which women tell the stories of other women's lives. We will investigate stylistic and theoretical approaches to writing biographies in which gender is a central focus. We will ask if "feminist biography" constitutes a literary genre. We will experience the challenges (and thrills) of conducting archival and primary research. The course will culminate in students writing chapter-length biographies.
Prerequisites: Gender Studies 101 or permission of Instructor

(Fall) Women and Gender in Science: Feminist Health Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Anthropology 216HP)
Health is about bodies, selves and politics. We will explore a series of health topics from feminist perspectives. How do gender, sexuality, class, disability, and age influence the ways in which one perceives and experiences health and the access one has to health information and health care? Are heteronormativity, cissexism, or one's place of living related to one's health status or one's health risk? By paying close attention to the relationships between community-based narratives, activities of health networks and organizations and theory, we will develop a solid understanding of the historical, political and cultural specificities of health issues, practices, services and movements.

(Spring) Gender and Power in Global Contexts: Land, Transnational Markets, and Democracy in Women's Lives and Activism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course will address the predicaments of women who must negotiate local contexts shaped by transnational markets, changing patterns of agriculture and agro-forestry, and struggles over indigenous land rights. How have arguments about democracy shaped the struggles women take up locally, nationally, and transnationally in opposition to corporate power, national policies, and supranational agencies such as the World Trade Organization?

(Fall) Gender and Power in Global Contexts: The Politics of Abortion in the Americas - *Not offered this year/term
(Politics 255PA)
The Americas have been characterized by the strictness of their laws in the criminalization of abortion. In some countries abortion is criminalized even when the woman's life is at risk. What role have women's movements played in advancing abortion rights? What has mattered most for a movement's success, its internal characteristics or external forces? Has the way the movement framed its demands mattered? How has the political influence of the Catholic and Evangelical churches influenced policies in this area? We will answer these questions by exploring examples from across the region through primary and secondary sources.

(Spring) Field Placement
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course; Speaking-intensive)
This course presents an opportunity for students to apply gender theory to practice and synthesize their work in gender studies. Connections between the academy and the community, scholarship and social action will be emphasized. Students will arrange for a placement at a non-profit organization, business, or institution that incorporates a gender focus. A weekly seminar with other students provides a structured reflection forum to analyze experience and methods.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Mary Lyon’s World and the History of Mount Holyoke
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement (History 333M I)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
What world gave rise to Mary Lyon’s vision for Mount Holyoke and enabled her to carry her plans to success? What local and global circumstances subsequently shaped the institution and the women who passed through it? How did Mount Holyoke women attempt to fashion the worlds they encountered in and beyond South Hadley and what came of their efforts? We will inquire into the historical arrangements of power—involving race, class, gender, religion, culture, body politics, and colonialism—that formed Mount Holyoke and the world in which it has operated. Students write a substantial research paper based on primary and secondary sources.
Prerequisites: 8 credits of History and prior fulfillment of the multicultural requirement or permission of instructor

(Taught in English; ASIAN 350)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
Seminar on love, desire and gender, major themes in Indian literature. We will read classic poems, plays, and narratives in translation from Sanskrit, Tamil, Hindi, and other languages, in relation to aesthetic theory, visual arts (miniature paintings) and performance genres (Indian dance and the modern Bollywood cinema). Study of the conventions of courtly love, including aesthetic mood (rasa) and natural landscapes, and their transformation in Hindu bhakti and Sufi Muslim mystical texts, the Radha-Krishna myth, and film. Focus on representations of women and men, and on issues of power, voice, and agency.

The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This course examines the social construction of the family unit in the United States across a range of historical periods and cultural texts. Students will dismantle universalist notions of what constitutes a family (particularly the nuclear family), understanding it instead as a social unit articulated by issues of race/ethnicity, gender, and sexuality and re(produced) with spatial and temporal specificities. Engaging first with historical texts to understand kinship as a legal, political and economic project, we will then turn to cultural production to investigate the role that literature, film, television, and art play in reifying, challenging, and/or reproducing the family.

  In this course, we will study the three most celebrated French female saints: Jeanne d'Arc, Thérèse de Lisieux and Bernadette de Lourdes. Their stories are similar: ordinary young women to whom extraordinary things happened, who became symbols of France and inspired a rich verbal and visual iconography. Yet they are profoundly different: Joan was a warrior, Thérèse a memoirist, Bernadette a visionary. We will study the facts of their lives, in their own words and those of others, but also the many fictions, semi-fictions, myths and legends based on those lives. We will analyze a number of films and visual images as well as literary and non-literary texts in our attempt to understand these cases of specifically female, specifically French sainthood.

  This seminar will examine foundational and recent US-based feminist and queer disability studies scholarship and activism. In particular, the course will focus on how scholars and activists have answered the question: What is disability justice? In order to answer this question, we will look at how disability has been constructed and treated historically and currently, particularly at the intersection of race, gender, and sexuality. We will also focus on how scholars and activists have challenged pathologizing and violent narratives about disability and created new ways of thinking about bodies, norms, our built environment, interdependency, and justice.

  (Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latina/o Studies 350CL, Latin American Studies 387CL, English 392CL)
  Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This seminar surveys works by Chicana and Latina authors. Selections from critical/theoretical works will situate our reading of literature produced by Chicana/Latina authors in the United States. Readings of novels, short stories, poems, essays, and plays by Chicana, Cuban American, Puerto Rican, and Dominican American authors provide students with a range of experiences and literary styles. Students will ask how the diversity of these texts bespeaks a shared or distinct experience across differences. Particular attention will be given to the challenges that Chicana/Latina writers pose towards nationalist movements, literary genres, cultural production, and feminisms.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Queering Race, Racing Queer
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This course will examine what queer studies scholarship can teach us about the social construction of race in the United States. To do so, the course will provide an introduction to queer of color critique and other queer studies scholarship that centrally engages questions of race, exploring this dynamic field including its origins in women of color feminism, foundational texts, and recent scholarship. The course will also examine what is meant by queer critique by examining scholarship that puts queer critique into practice through reading different sites of race-making, with the goal of students learning how to deploy their own queer readings.

The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This course offers a history of women in performance, from the colonial era to the present day. Americans inherited a European theatrical economy that was largely male dominated, though actresses played a central role on stage and in the public imagination. Today, while serious inequities remain, women are gaining access to the most privileged and powerful positions in a swiftly changing field. We are therefore equally interested in how women have participated in theatrical culture—as actors, producers, playwrights, directors, designers, managers, and audience members—and how they have been represented on commercial, experimental, and regional stages, and across genres and communities.

(Em)bodi/ment: body/mind. How does our culture fantasize about severing them? Where is there ever pure mind, pure body? Who counts as able, as broken, or as food? How does discipline, punishment, and usefulness come into play? What is agency and knowledge in relation to embodiment? We will study different "problem" cases of embodiment where the fabric of culture begins to unravel: athletics, birthing, breeding and assisted reproduction, chronic illness, dairy, disability, drugs, dying, fatness, pregnancy, queerness, sexuality, speech ("disorder"), and others. Much of the seminar's agenda will be driven by students' own research and interests in studying embodiment.

This interdisciplinary course explores Latina feminism as a distinct mode of thought and inquiry. In particular, we will examine how Latina feminist approaches inform our research questions, allow us to analyze women's experiences and women's history, and challenges patriarchy and gender inequality. We will explore topics related to the politics of feminist analysis, representation, colonialism and empire, and Latina feminist methodologies. Our approach in this class will employ an interlocking analysis to feminist theory that understands the interconnectedness between multiple forms of oppression, including race, class, sexuality, and ability. Our goal is to develop an understanding of how Latina feminist methodology and epistemology can be tools for social change.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Gender and Class in the Victorian Novel - *Not offered this year/term
(English 323s)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course will investigate how representations of gender and class serve as a structuring principle in the development of the genre of the Victorian novel in Britain. We will devote significant attention to the construction of Victorian femininity and masculinity in relation to class identity, marriage as a sexual contract, and the gendering of labor. The texts chosen for this course also reveal how gender and class are constructed in relation to other axes of identity in the period, such as race, sexuality, and national character. Novelists will include Dickens, Eliot, Gaskell, C. Bronte, and Hardy. Supplementary readings in literary criticism and theory.

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

Mary Daly, Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza, Phyllis Trible, and Judith Plaskow, among others, have argued that traditional Jewish and Christian theological systems have overlooked the needs, concerns, histories, and contributions of women. Their challenges range from the historical modification of a presumably unbiased religious system to the outright rejection of a so-called patriarchal establishment. Whatever their approach, feminist theologies offer diverse and incisive tools for understanding how a theological system operates, how transitory cultural assumptions become embedded in ongoing doctrines, and how apparently minor adjustments can have significant ripple effects.

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

Recent cultural histories of imperialism—European as well as U.S.—have illuminated the workings of race and gender at the heart of imperial encounters. This course will examine the United States’ relationship to imperialism through the lens of such cultural histories. How has the encounter between Europe and America been remembered in the United States? How has the cultural construction of "America" and its "others" called into play racial and gender identities? How have the legacies of slavery been entwined with U.S. imperial ambitions at different times? And what can we learn from transnational approaches to "the intimacies of empire?"

This course explores the gendered domains of food and agriculture as they unfold within household and community economies in the global south and in G-8 countries. We will examine the place of women in systems of food production, processing, marketing, and consumption. We will address locally regulated markets, cuisines, and peasant farming systems as they interface with international neo-liberal systems of market and trade. We will also pay close attention to emergent women’s agricultural cooperatives and unions as they shape new transnational coalitions that offer sustainable (and flourishing) solutions to problems associated with post-industrial agriculture.

This course will examine the historical and cultural creation of the Shaker society. Shakers were convinced that celibacy was the primary teaching of the Christian message. In the process, they reconfigured traditional understanding of God and Christ to include major female components, and they constructed a series of communities, built worlds, to reflect a new social and political order. Their music, art, and extensive visionary material also carries their understanding of gender relations and sexual activity (or lack thereof) into all areas of life in America. They were patriotic, but did not vote; were pacifists, anti-slavery, and communitarian.

The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This course studies the films of Pedro Almodóvar, European cinema’s favorite bad boy turned acclaimed auteur. On the one hand, students learn to situate films within the context of contemporary Spanish history (the transition to democracy, the advent of globalization, etc.) in order to consider the local contours of postmodern aesthetics. On the other hand, the films provide a springboard to reflect on larger theoretical and ethical debates. For instance, what can a weeping transvestite teach us about desire? What happens when plastic surgery and organ transplants become metaphors? Under what circumstances, if any, can spectators find child prostitution cute?

From the middle ages to the present day, witches have evoked both fear and fascination. Their fellowships (real or fantastic) challenged the prevailing power structures of church and state patriarchies and upset the ordered precepts of the modern world. This seminar offers an overview of the history of witchcraft in Atlantic cultures, with special attention to the early modern British and American colonial eras. We will examine figures of the witch in European art; religious and legal texts that document the persecution of sorcerers; and dramatic, literary, and cinematic representations of witches that have helped to shape our understanding of gender, nature, theatricality, and power.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Provides a comprehensive introduction to maps, including their design, compilation, and computer production. Introduces students to the principles of abstracting the Earth's surface into spatial databases using GIS, remote sensing, and Global Positioning Satellites.
Instructors: T. Millette
Expected enrollment: 24

GEOG-205-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Spring) Mapping and Spatial Analysis
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Provides a comprehensive introduction to maps, including their design, compilation, and computer production. Introduces students to the principles of abstracting the Earth's surface into spatial databases using GIS, remote sensing, and Global Positioning Satellites.
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOG-206-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Spring) Political Geography
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Systematically studies political phenomena and their geographic expression, at a variety of spatial scales - national, regional, and international. Major themes include nation-state formation, boundary, territory, and ethnic issues, regional blocs and spheres of influence, and conflicts over access to and use of resources.
Instructors: G. Kebbede
Expected enrollment: 40

GEOG-208-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Global Movements: Migrations, Refugees and Diasporas
The voluntary and involuntary movement of people around the globe is the focus of this course on migrations, refugees, and diasporas. Questions of borders, nativism, transnationalism, the global economy, and legality thread through this course as we consider the many social, cultural, environmental, economic, and political factors shaping decisions to leave a home or homeland. Historical and contemporary case studies, compelling theoretical texts, and geographic perspectives on these topics collectively animate our discussions.

Instructors: S. Houston
Expected enrollment: 30

GEOG-210-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) GIS for the Social Sciences
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course introduces the use of Geographic Information Systems (GIS) and other geospatial technologies in the social sciences and the humanities. The student will learn to collect, process, and analyze quantitative data within the spatial (geographic) context where they occur. Course content may include research topics from current faculty.
Prerequisites: Proficiency with computers and quantitative data analysis
Instructors: E. Marcano
Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) The Political Economy of the Middle East and North Africa - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
In this course, the Middle East and North Africa are studied in terms of their physical, cultural, economic, and political geography. Emphasis is placed on the environmental conditions and ecological evolution, population and demographic characteristics, the resource base and major problems in the social, political, and economic transformation of the region.
Instructors: G. Kebbede
Expected enrollment: 30

GEOG-217-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) The African Environments
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
The course provides an integrated analysis of biogeography, environmental change, and hydrology within each of the biomes found in the African continent: forest, savanna, desert, coast, wetland, mountain, and Mediterranean environments. It also discusses the impact and significance of human activity on African environments by exploring debates about land degradation, climate change, biodiversity and depletion, and conservation and development.
Instructors: G. Kebbede
Expected enrollment: 30

GEOG-230-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Spring) Environmental Soil Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Introduction to the physical, chemical, and biological properties of soils and their relationship to environmental quality, agricultural production, and land management. This course will also describe the processes of origin and development of soils as natural entities and how they affect the different ecosystems where they are located. Some field work required.
Prerequisites: Any 100 or 200 level science course or Geography 107
Instructors: E. Marcano
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOG-295-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: soph and permission of instructor
Instructors: The department

GEOG-295-01 - Geography - 2015-2016

Prerequisites: soph or permission of instructor
Instructors: The department
GEOG-304-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Planning and the Environment - Special Topics: Urban Planning
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines in detail the fabric of urban and suburban settlement and commerce in the pre and post WW-II U.S. Field trips to the greater Springfield area are used to allow students to develop firsthand understanding of interactions between urban and suburban areas and to recognize the major changes to the human landscape driven by suburbanization and urban abandonment. This class will examine the section of Springfield slated for the MGM Casino Development.
Prerequisites: Any 200-level geography course
Instructors: T. Millette
Expected enrollment: 12

GEOG-311-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminars - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): These seminars present selected topics in geography that reflect contemporary problems, current geographical ideas, philosophical and methodological trends in geography, and/or the history and development of geographical thought.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 1 class in department and 1 200-level class in related social sciences
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 18

GEOG-313-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Third World Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
Offers an interdisciplinary perspective on social, economic, and political features of contemporary development in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, regions referred to as the Third World or the South, and provides an introduction to theoretical origins and definitions of economic growth, development, and underdevelopment. It then addresses more specific aspects of development such as trends in population growth, migration, and urbanization; agrarian change; livelihood strategies and aspects of social welfare such as health, education, and shelter; poverty and the environment; and external economic relationships. The latter part of the course draws extensively on selected case studies.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 4 credits in Geography and 4 credits in related social sciences at 200-level
Instructors: G. Kebbede
Expected enrollment: 20

GEOG-319-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Spring) Africa: Problems and Prospects
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
This course intends to offer an interdisciplinary perspective on selected contemporary development problems in Africa south of the Sahara. Central to the course will be an examination of the social, economic, and political consequences of colonialism, the physical resource base and ecological crisis, agrarian systems and rural development, gender relations and development, urbanization and industrialization, and the problems and prospects of regional cooperation and integration.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, soph only with permission of instructor; 4 credits in department and 4 credits at the 200 level in geography or related social science.
Instructors: G. Kebbede
Expected enrollment: 18

GEOG-320-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Spring) Research with Geospatial Technologies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Geographic Information Systems (GIS) and remote sensing are essential tools for geographic analysis in both the biophysical and social sciences. This course uses a semester-long project that includes field and laboratory instruction to allow students to develop hands-on skills with spatial data and analysis software. Students will be able to present potential employers with a portfolio containing examples of their ability to develop and execute a GIS/remote sensing application project.
Prerequisites: Geography 205
Instructors: T. Millette
Expected enrollment: 15

GEOG-395-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, permission of instructor
GEOG-395-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Spring) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, permission of instructor
Instructors: The department

GEOG-399-01 - Geography - 2015-2016
(Fall) Getting Ahead in Geology and Geography
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: Geography or Geology Major or Minor
Notes: Course meets on Fridays after Earth Adventures
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 20

Geology

GEOL-100-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Physical Geology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Humans are intimately connected with and dependent upon the physical environment. We have only been present on the Earth for a brief span, but we try to understand how the Earth has evolved since its formation over four billion years ago. Our knowledge of the Earth is critical, not only for reconstructing its history, but also for helping us to understand issues relevant to our lives, such as the availability of natural resources, pollution, climate change, and natural hazards. In this course, we will perform a general survey of the physical Earth. In classroom, lab and field, we will examine rocks and minerals of which the solid Earth is composed, processes that generate the Earth's landforms, natural hazards associated with those processes, and geologic time.
Instructors: M. Markley
Section Instructors: 01 LAB P Taylor | 02 LAB P Taylor |
Expected enrollment: 24

GEOL-101-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Environmental Geology with Lab - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The only planet known to sustain life, Earth provides all the resources that sustain us, yet it can be an unpredictable and sometimes dangerous home. Floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and other natural processes challenge our ingenuity, while we also contend with self-induced problems such as pollution, desertification, and even global climate change. This course examines earth processes, how these affect our lives, and how we can best live with and sustain our environment. The labs cover selected geologic topics including methods for recognizing and interpreting environmental hazards, and developing strategies to address environmental problems.
Prerequisites: Preference given to first- and second- year students during the first week of registration. Juniors and Seniors should check ISIS after that for availability.
Instructors: S. Dunn
Section Instructors: 01 LAB P Taylor | 02 LAB P Taylor | 03 LAB P Taylor | 04 LAB P Taylor |
Expected enrollment: 60

GEOL-102-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Fall) History of Life - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
First-year seminar
Life forms have inhabited the surface of our planet for most of its history. Earth, as a result, has a unique geology that is unlike that of any other planet. In this course we will examine the interrelations between life processes and Earth's crust and atmosphere and how they work together to create the geology of the planet. Using both the rock and fossil record, we will study the origin and evolution of life, the history of continents and oceans, and the diversification of complex life forms. Laboratory and field trips will emphasize identification and analysis of sediments, rocks, and fossils.
Instructors: M. McMenamin
GEOL-103-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Oceanography
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Because more than seventy percent of our planet is covered by oceans, the study of marine systems is crucial to our understanding of Earth History and life on the planet. We will examine chemical, physical, geological, and biological processes in the oceans at a variety of scales in time and space. We will explore how the Earth's oceans formed, how they provided the foundations for life, and how they continue to affect weather and climate, stabilize global chemical cycles, erode coastlines and provide access to resources. We will conclude the semester with a discussion of the human impact on the ocean environment including sea level rise, acidification, coral bleaching and over-fishing.
Instructors: A. Werner
Expected enrollment: 75

GEOL-107-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Environmental Geology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The only planet known to sustain life, Earth provides all the resources that sustain us, yet at the same time it can be an unpredictable and sometimes dangerous home. Floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and other natural processes challenge our ingenuity, while we also contend with self-induced problems such as pollution, desertification, and even global climate change. This course examines earth processes, how these affect our lives, and how we can best live with and sustain our environment. May be taken for 200-level credit with permission of instructor.
Instructors: S. Dunn
Expected enrollment: 60

(Fall) Precious Drops: The Geology of Groundwater and Fossil Fuels
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Are we running out of drinking water? Is fracking safe? When is peak oil? This course is a basic geology course that focuses on two earth materials we use every day: fresh water and fossil fuels. We cover where groundwater is found and why, the depletion and contamination of groundwater, and some major aquifers. We will also explore the formation, worldwide distribution, and extraction of coal, oil, and natural gas. This course introduces students to physical and historical geology, focusing particularly on plate tectonics and sedimentary basins, with attention to current events and illustrations from around the world.
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 75

GEOL-115-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) First-Year Seminar: Emergence of Animals - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
The origin of animals was one of the most important events in the history of earth. In this course we will review the history of the planet, learn basic geology, and then examine the problem of the origin of animals by studying Mount Holyoke's unequaled collection of Precambrian and Cambrian fossils. The emergence of animals has been called the Cambrian Explosion. We will examine what this means for our understanding of evolutionary theory.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: M. McMenamin
Expected enrollment: 20

GEOL-123-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Methods in Earth Science
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course provides a hands-on introduction to earth science and methods in geology, and it augments all the 100-level geology courses. Students will learn the fundamental tools of the trade and explore local geology on field trips. Interactive laboratory work will include projects on groundwater quality, landfill siting, geologic hazards, and earth materials. Students will also develop skills in reading topographic and geologic maps.
Prerequisites: Any 100-level geology course (may be taken concurrently)
Notes: Several field trips are required.
Instructors: S. Dunn, P. Taylor
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-201-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Rocks and Minerals
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this course you will learn to recognize the common rock-forming minerals and principal rock types, and to understand their origins, properties, associations, and geological significance. Observational skills and hand sample identification will be emphasized in lab and on field trips. Students must have either a one-year high school earth science class or any 100- or 200-level geology course or Geography 107. One or more field trips required.

Instructors: S. Dunn
Section Instructors: 01 LAB S Dunn |
Expected enrollment: 16

GEOL-202-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) History of Earth
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course explores the evolution and interaction of life, rocks, oceans, and air during the past 4 billion years of earth history. Some topics covered are: ice ages and greenhouse atmospheres, continental drift, extinctions and radiations of flora and fauna, the early evolution of earth, absolute and relative dating of rocks, and the geologic time scale. Oral presentations and writing assignments focus on the design and testing of earth science hypotheses, critical analysis of recently published research on earth history, and proposal writing. The final exam involves memorization of the geologic time scale and significant events in earth history.
Prerequisites: Any introductory Geology or Environmental Studies course or permission of instructor
Notes: 3 meetings (50 minutes)
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-203-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Surface Processes
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The surface of the Earth is a history book of past environmental change. Every hill and valley, every erosional feature and every deposit is the result of processes acting at the Earth’s surface. In this course we study these processes (e.g. glaciers, rivers, slopes, coastlines, arid regions, frozen ground, cave formation, soil development and groundwater) to understand how they work and to understand the resulting landforms and deposits. With this understanding we can then observe different landforms and deposits and infer past processes (environments of deposition). Field work and trips allow students to explore first-hand the processes that have created and modified the Earth’s surface.
Prerequisites: Any introductory Geology or Environmental Studies course or permission of instructor
Instructors: A. Werner
Section Instructors: 01 LAB A Werner | 02 LAB A Werner |
Expected enrollment: 26

GEOL-210-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Plate Tectonics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Plate tectonic theory explains the origins of volcanoes and earthquakes, continental drift, and the locations of mountain belts and oceans. This course focuses on the geometry of plate tectonics. Topics include mid-ocean ridge systems, transform faults, subduction zones, relative plate motion, earthquake analysis, triple point junctions, and stereographic projection. Work includes individual research projects on active plate boundaries.
Notes: Comfort with geometry and trigonometry required.
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 20

GEOL-211-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Uranium - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
From the A-bomb to zircon, uranium has revolutionized humanity's destructive potential and wisdom about time. Uranium is the planet's heaviest naturally occurring element, and it transforms by both radioactive decay and nuclear fission. This course uses computer modeling to explore these two transformations and what we make of them, specifically: the age of the earth, high-precision dating of recent geologic and climate events, nuclear power, nuclear weapons, plutonium production, and the uniquely long-term challenge of nuclear waste disposal and storage.
Prerequisites: Any course in Chemistry, Geology, Math, or Statistics
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 18

GEOL-224-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Paleontology-Stratigraphy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an intensive study of fossils, fossil preservation, relationships between major groups of organisms, depositional environments, sediments, sedimentary rocks, and the processes of sedimentation. We will employ the principles of stratigraphic analysis and correlation to interpret ancient environments and paleoclimate, reconstruct paleogeography, and probe the characteristics of sedimentary basins. Laboratory exercises and field trips will introduce a variety of analytical techniques used to study sedimentary rocks.

Prerequisites: one course in geology at the 100 or 200 level or permission of instructor

Instructors: The department

Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department

Expected enrollment: 18

GEOL-227-01 - Geology - 2015-2016

(Spring) Groundwater

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

The demand for and the contamination of groundwater resources are major environmental concerns. To better understand the dynamics of the groundwater system, we will cover topics including the hydrologic cycle, surface and subsurface hydrology, groundwater resource evaluation, and groundwater geotechnical problems. Students are required to prepare weekly problem sets/labs, a term paper, and an oral presentation.

Prerequisites: Any 100-level geology course

Instructors: A. Werner

Section Instructors: 01 LAB A Werner

(Spring) Igneous and Metamorphic Petrology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course covers mineralogical and chemical compositions, classification, genesis, and mode of occurrence of igneous and metamorphic rocks, including relationships between rock-forming processes and global plate tectonics; labs involve the study of representative rock suites in hand specimen and thin section, introduction to analytical techniques and in-depth coverage of mineral optics. One or more field trips required.

Prerequisites: Geology 201 or Permission of instructor

Instructors: S. Dunn

Section Instructors: 01 LAB S Dunn

Expected enrollment: 15

GEOL-326-01 - Geology - 2015-2016

(Spring) Seminar: Global Climate Change

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Earth's dynamic climate system is rapidly changing. This course will introduce you to the science behind climate change predictions as they apply to past, present, and future changes in our earth's climate. We will also discuss how, over the course of time, we adapted to these changing conditions with a specific focus on water resources and natural disasters, including floods, droughts, and hurricanes that have been predicted to intensify in response to ongoing climate change.

Prerequisites: 1 200-level Geology or Environmental Studies course or permission of instructor

Instructors: K. Kanamaru

Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-333-01 - Geology - 2015-2016

(Fall) Structural Geology and Orogenesis

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This course covers the basic techniques of field geology and structural analysis. Lectures concentrate on field techniques, stress, strain, faulting, folding, rock strength, deformation mechanisms, and multidisciplinary approaches to mountain building (orogenesis). Many labs are field trips that involve data collection. Weekly writing assignments focus on presenting original research and distinguishing between observations and interpretations. During the final weeks of the semester, oral presentations emphasize fluency in the published literature of structural geology using a case study from Death Valley, California.
Prerequisites: Geology 201

Expected enrollment: 20

GEOL-342-01 - Geology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar: Death Valley Field Course
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Preamble (for topics courses): Seminars offer directed study and discussion of one or more selected topics in geology. Topics vary from year to year. Consult the department for information about future seminars.
This seminar will cover selected topics on the geology of Death Valley region, California. We will meet for two hours per week up until spring break, then embark on a ten-day field trip to Death Valley National Park, Thursday, March 10 - Saturday, March 19, 2016. A participation fee is required. Students will be responsible for researching particular topics and presenting a pre-trip oral report and a post-trip written final report.
Prerequisites: three geology courses and permission of instructor
Notes: 1 meeting (2 hours) and ten-day field trip (Thursday March 10-Saturday, March 19, 2016); enrollment limited; 4 cr
Instructors: M. Markley

(Fall) Getting Ahead in Geology and Geography
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Geography 399)
This course provides support and mentoring for geology and geography majors as they pursue internships, summer jobs, independent research, and careers. Experiences will include: resume and communication workshops; self-reflection and sharing opportunities for students returning from internships, work experiences, and semesters abroad; guidance on preparing for, selecting, and applying to graduate school; information about careers in education and teacher licensure; and discussion of new research in geology and geography.
Prerequisites: Geology or Geography Major or Minor

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Remembering as Reconciliation in the Wake of Violence

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

We explore how memorialization and reconciliation take place in societies that have experienced extreme violence. How do survivors, perpetrators and their descendants record the experience of atrocity through testimonials and memorials in ways that contrast with "official" national narratives of the past? In what ways does memorialization end cycles of violence without re-triggering trauma? How does restorative justice, for example, address feelings of despair or guilt that get passed down from one generation to another? Our transnational study will include examples from Germany, Japan, Rwanda, and Cambodia primarily, with other examples included based on student interest.

(Fall) Intermediate German

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
This course emphasizes further development of contextual reading, writing, and speaking skills in German. Focus on strategies that help students learn vocabulary and use grammatical structures in appropriate ways. Discussion of a variety of texts and genres, as well as exploration of topics such as immigration and social justice. Frequent writing assignments and speaking opportunities.

GRMST-215-01 - German Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Lesen, Schreiben, Sprechen - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking-intensive)
Intensive practice in reading, writing, and speaking German. Students will write short essays on topics of their choosing, in addition to application letters and a sample résumé for an internship or job in Germany. We will focus also on developing reading strategies and on improving students' ability to converse colloquially, idiomatically, and formally in German. Readings on popular culture, music, as well as current political, social, cultural, historical, and economic issues in the German-speaking world, reflecting student interest and academic focus. Students engage in a variety of speaking activities such as presentations, role-playing and simulations, pair work, and group discussions.

Prerequisites: German Studies 201

Notes: Students in German Studies 221f or 223f are strongly encouraged to enroll in German Studies 215f or 216s for additional language practice and review along with the focus on culture studies topics in 221 and 223.

(Fall) German Culture Today: Stories and Histories
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course examines historical, cultural, and political developments that continue to frame debates about the twentieth century, World War II, the former GDR, and German unification. Thematic focus helps students develop accuracy, fluency, and complexity of expression. Reading, writing, and speaking are consistently integrated. Special emphasis placed on text organization toward expanding students' language abilities, with a gradual movement from personal forms of expression to written and public discourse.

Prerequisites: Previous study of German, normally equivalent to three semesters of college German, or three or more years of high school German; or permission of instructor.

Instructors: A. Holden

Expected enrollment: 19

(Spring) Topics in German Studies: German Unification Revisited: The GDR and the Politics of Memory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Twenty-five years after German unification, the legacy of East Germany (GDR) continues to be the topic of popular culture and scholarship alike. How do post-Wall films, literature, and memoirs depict everyday life in the former GDR? How do these depictions intersect with transnational issues of migration, identity, and responses to oppression? How do we account for the contradictory emotions that emerge in renditions of the GDR from Ostalgie to comparisons between the Stasi and the Gestapo? We explore the changing depictions of the GDR by insiders and outsiders against the backdrop of current debates about the legacy of the GDR within the ongoing conflicts in contemporary Europe.

(Fall) Topics in German Studies: "Curing" the Woes of Integration?: Culturally Diverse Film Comedy as "Medicine" - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Film Studies 220FC)
Early on, German cinema was embroiled in heated debates about its value: Is it, like the theater, both entertainment and education? Does it, like the novel, tell a narrative that makes us laugh and cry? Can it help us discern the constructions of our individual, national, and transnational identities? In recent decades, Germany, and Western Europe, have grappled with integrating large migrant groups. Politicians are frantically searching for a nostrum to cure the ills purportedly caused by integration failure; anti-immigrant rightist parties are growing in the EU. Yet a vibrant corpus of comedic films and literature about and by migrants has arisen. Will laughter prove the "best medicine"?
Prerequisites: Previous study of German, normally equivalent to 4 or more semesters of college German, or 4-5 years of high school German; or extended exchange study in a German-speaking country; or per I.

(Fall) Topics in German and European Studies in a Global Context: Introduction to Nineteenth-Century Critical Social Thought - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English)
Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written as well as media strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the readers'viewers' diverse responses to them.
An introduction to some of the great critical voices of the nineteenth century with emphasis on their relevance for contemporary issues. We will explore the ideas of such mutinous thinkers as Karl Marx Friedrich Nietzsche, Sigmund Freud, Fyodor Dostoyevsky, W.E.B. Du Bois and Franz Kafka focusing on the style as well as the substance of their works and the circumstances that provoked them to write and/or that their writings helped provoke. The course will highlight the tension between appearance and reality, the dialectic of domination and subordination, and the place of reason and irrationality in social life. Case studies of contemporary issues with attention to the impact of 19th century thinkers on critical theory in the 20th and 21st centuries also round out the course.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr, or permission of instructor
Notes: Students with one or more years of college-level German may opt for German 232, a tutorial in close reading and translation of the German texts related to the material in 231. Students with no previous study of German are encouraged to take German 101 or 103 to complement this course.

(Fall) Topics in German Studies: Representing the Holocaust in Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Film Studies 220RH)
Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written as well as media strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the readers'/viewers' diverse responses to them.
To mark the seventieth anniversary of the end of World War II, this seminar explores the impact of films depicting the European Holocaust from the first encounter between the liberators and the survivors up to the present day. We analyze the global contexts in which the films came into being and the changing reception of the films with the advent of digital distribution. With a focus on less well-known films from newly distributed archival footage and more recent documentaries made by second and third-generation children of survivors and perpetrators, we examine issues such as the precarious relationship between memory and history and the ethics of filming the dead and individuals in pain.

(Spring) German Studies Tutorial: Comedy in German Film and Media from Weimar Cinema to the Present
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Focus on developing discussion and reading skills in German, and revising and editing papers, or media projects, composed in German for German studies courses taught in English. Oral presentation skills for study abroad and prospective employment.

We discuss selected film comedies in German from GRMST-231 taught in English, Haunted Utopia? Weimar Cinema, as well additional films and TV-clips from contemporary German public media. The role of language in comedy should be particularly critical for us because of the issue of (un)translatability. Furthermore, our focus is on in-depth discussion and diverse "readings" of the films. All students will create a critique as an oral presentation in the form of a brief (1-2 page) position paper. This "Thesenpapier" will state the overall concept (Haupthese), outline major arguments (Thesen) in bullet form and end with a stimulus for plenary discussion.

Prerequisites: Intermediate-level of German and above—if unsure please contact instructor.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Film Studies 370BK)

This course studies selected filmmakers from Weimar to the present who have filmed literary texts and evoked the wrath of the censors: Sternberg's Blue Angel, H. Mann's Professor Unrat with Dietrich as the New Woman; Dudow/Brecht's Proletarian film, Kuhle Wampe, censored for including an abortion; Szabós 1981 film of Klaus Mann's 1936 novel Mephisto, banned to protect actor Gustav Gründgens from a questionable Third Reich past. Also, works by Kleist, Storm, Fontane, Hesse, Kafka, and Thomas Mann inspired filmmakers like Fassbinder, Huntgeburth, and Haneke, not only because they broke existing taboos but also by foregrounding current issues such as globalization, alienation, terrorism, and homophobia.

(Spring) Topics in German and European Culture in a Global Context: The Politics of Memory in Postwar Germany and Japan - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Cultural exchanges between German and Japanese peoples have taken place for over 400 years. What has triggered and sustained exchanges of cultural, social, artistic, and military traditions? How have these historical exchanges affected the remembrance of WW II, the Holocaust, the Nanjing massacre, forced prostitution of Korean and other women, and the nuclear destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki? We focus on the process of remembering war and atrocity as depicted through different media, such as first-hand accounts, fictional narratives, photographs and other visual images. Students are encouraged to combine primary research in any language and in multiple media.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course examines the cultural, political and social developments from 1800 to the present by investigating a significant topic. The selection of materials is exemplary rather than comprehensive and is based on thematic, historical, generic and other units.

The "long 19th century," with the political explosion of the French Revolution and the scientific explosion of the steam engine, burst into modernity, defining itself and the "short 20th century" in manifold areas: science, economics, politics, art, literature, education. Controversial values are attributed to concepts like secularization, nation-building, industrialization, and democratization. We will analyze representations in film and text of such discoveries and visions, e.g., in bacteriology, environmentalism, political and social upheaval, the concept of a democratic nation state, Marx's theories, Bismark's German unification, the social-security system, and women's movements.

(Fall) Senior Capstone Seminar: Deutschsein--Images of "Being German": Identities, Languages, and Cultures

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This seminar is designed to explore the nature of our field of inquiry in theory and practice. 1) All students read texts exploring such questions as: What does German Studies mean? What is interdisciplinary work? What role does literature play in culture studies? What is the relationship between language and the construction of culture? Why learn German vis a vis global English? What meanings have been attributed to the terms "culture" and "civilization"? 2) Students pursue independent research connecting German studies and another major academic fields of interest, respond critically to each other's work, and lead discussions.

Fouqué's Undine, a "migrant" author's bestseller of Romanticism -- the iconic era of German Nationalism -- inspired Austrian Bachmann in her 1961 subversive tale Undine geht, which challenges and transcends gender and other social-cultural boundaries. Weimar Cinema "realized" the cultural-critical and economic dimensions of Romantic texts by filming the margins: Dracula, shadows, fairytales. Even Nazi-supporter Riefenstahl drew on the dark side of the tradition. All postwar Germanys have struggled to find common languages for a globalized economy and a de-facto immigrant society. Presently culture wars are raging again about gender-inclusive language and the Judeo-Christian tradition versus Islam.

Prerequisites: sr; adv knowledge of German; non-srs by perm of the instructor.

Notes: Pending approval by the AAB, this seminar may constitute the first 4 cr of the 8 cr of independent work required in Faculty Legislation for completion of an honors thesis. In 2016s, students would continue the project started in 325f, in a 395 project with a supervisor of their choice. Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)
This First Year seminar examines the political and cultural power of the New York Times in the American past and present. Students will analyze the Times today through careful, daily readings. They will also study its evolution as an institution, as well as its coverage of critical historical events. By focusing on the Times as the most influential "agenda setter" in American journalism, we will address larger issues of objectivity, bias, and influence in the mass media. We will also consider the complex relationship between journalism and history.

(Fall) Modern East Asia, 1600-2000
A comparative history of China, Japan, and Korea from the early seventeenth century to the present, with strong focus on regional interaction. After an introduction to early modern histories and cultures, we will examine the struggles of these countries to preserve or regain their independence and establish their national identities in a rapidly changing, often violent modern world order. While each of these countries has its own distinctive identity, their overlapping histories (and dilemmas) give the region a coherent shape. We will also look at how individuals respond to and are shaped by larger historical movements.

(Spring) British Empire and Commonwealth
This course is an introduction to the expansion, consolidation, and eventual disintegration of the modern British Empire in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. We will examine this history with an eye to understanding the causes of empire, and its effects. Themes include formal and informal imperialism, the emergence of anti-colonial nationalism, the roles of gender and culture, and the legacies of British colonialism. We will discuss British attitudes and policies toward empire, and toward particular colonies, what role empire played in the growth of the British economy, in short, how colonial ideologies and practices were shaped and in turn affected vast regions of the globe.

(Spring) Muslim Politics in Modern South Asia

Taken together, Muslims in South Asia constitute the largest population of Muslims worldwide. This course will serve as an introduction to the political history of this diverse group of people. We will begin by considering religious conversion and the rule of Muslim kings in the premodern period. The bulk of the course will, however, concentrate on the modern history of the subcontinent, and especially on events and themes that continue to influence the countries and peoples of South Asia in the present, such as Muslim social reform, the rise of communalism, the partition of the subcontinent, and the influence of religion on contemporary politics.

(Spring) Bread and Circuses: The Politics of Public Entertainment in Ancient Rome

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

"Bread and circuses" (panem et circenses) was a catchphrase in the Roman empire that described the political strategy of controlling an unruly populace through free bread and public entertainment. Against a backdrop of Roman social and political institutions, this course focuses on the imperial ideology, aristocratic ethos, and cultural practices that underpinned this catchphrase, as well as questions concerning the careers of entertainers—gladiators, charioteers, and actors—who were at once celebrities and social outcasts; the rules of spectatorship at the games; the use of these games as a form of social control; and the logistics of feeding the city population.

The Atlantic World
Early Americans inhabited an interconnected world through which people, beliefs, and objects circulated. This course explores the "Atlantic World" as both a place and a concept: an ocean surrounded by diverse communities and empires, and an imagined space of shared or competing affiliations. Moving from the fifteenth to the nineteenth century, it examines ecological, cultural, political, economic, intellectual, and religious exchanges among Native Americans, Europeans, and Africans. It will introduce both conceptual dimensions of this Atlantic paradigm and case studies that investigate its human subtleties, with the goal of examining early American history through a transnational lens.
Notes: meets history department pre-1750 requirement
Instructors: C. DeLucia
Expected enrollment: 30
An introduction to interdisciplinary research methods in history, social science, and the digital humanities, using environmental change and public health as themes for investigation. Topics include the collection, organization, and analysis of information from on-line databases and research collections as well as bibliographic management. Computer-assisted analysis of textual information and GIS will be introduced to study agricultural change, industrialization, and public health during the 19th and early 20th centuries with data on Great Britain. Research projects for the U.S. are possible but limited by less abundant digital data on public health.

(Fall) Stalinism in Central Europe
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course explores the use of revolutionary terror by the state. More specifically, it examines policies of terror pursued by Communist dictatorships in Hungary and Czechoslovakia during the early years of the Cold War. Who did what to whom, and why? What insights do secret police work and public propaganda, knitted together in macabre show trials, allow us into Stalinist rule, European politics, and maybe ourselves? How did memories of terror shape politics after Stalin's death? Students should deepen their understanding for the discipline of History, improve their reading and writing, and develop a working knowledge of Central European politics at the middle of the twentieth century.

(Fall) U.S. Women's History since 1890
(Gender Studies 206US)

This course introduces students to the major themes of U.S. women's history from the 1890s to the present. We will look both at the experiences of a diverse group of women in the U.S. as well as the ideological meaning of gender as it evolved and changed over the twentieth century. We will chart the various meanings of womanhood (for example, in relation to motherhood, work, the domestic sphere, and sexuality) along racial, ethnic, and class lines and in different regions, and will trace the impact multiple identities have had on women's activism.

HIST-301-01 - History - 2015-2016
(Spring) Colloquium: The Age of Emancipation
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
This colloquium examines the causes and the course of the Civil War, its social, economic, and political results during Reconstruction, and the early roots of both de jure segregation and the civil rights movement. It will examine the process of emancipation from the perspective of social history. Violent conflicts over free labor, the establishment of sharecropping, and the political and economic policies pursued by various groups—freedpeople, ex-masters, northern policymakers, wage laborers, and African American women, for example—will be covered. African American viewpoints and histories will receive particular emphasis.

(Spring) Colloquium: The Global Turn: The Modern Middle East in Global Context
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course explores themes in the modern Middle East in light of the "global" turn. The first three weeks will explore various theoretical questions that inform the course. Students will learn about such concepts as "transnationalism," "internationalism," and "globalization." The rest of the course will explore numerous themes from the late nineteenth century to the present. This includes: the rise of the world economy, imperialism, the first wave of globalization, World War I and internationalism, the Palestine/Israel conflict and transnationalism, the global Cold War, oil, the "Global War on Terror," and political Islam, and the recent Arab uprisings.

(Fall) Perspectives on American Environmental History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
We explore the history of human-environment interactions in North America from precolonial times to the present from different cultural perspectives. How have such human activities as migration, colonization, and resource use depended on or modified the natural world? How have different cultural perceptions of and attitudes toward environment shifted through time and helped to reshape American landscapes? Case studies include ecological histories of Native America and Euro-America, slavery and land use, wilderness and conservation, and environmental racism and social justice. Our approach entails historical review of scientific studies, literature, visual records, and oral tradition.

(Fall) Asian History: Popular Culture in East Asia
Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.
From manga to K-pop, East Asian cultural influence has expanded worldwide. This course explores popular cultures in China, Japan, Korea, Taiwan, and Hong Kong from the 18th century to the present. Using interdisciplinary techniques and sources, we will investigate traditional forms such as Chinese opera, pansori, and kabuki; the emergence of cities as centers for popular culture; and connections with technology, ideology, and gender. Following intensive discussion of readings and visual materials in the classroom, students will undertake a final research project based on primary sources--movies, TV programs, magazines, novels, plays, popular songs, etc.--and present their work to the class.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Students who wish to register should fill out the 300-level application form on the History department's website: https://www.mtholyoke.edu/acad/history/300-level_application
Instructors: S. Lee

(Spring) Asian History: Chinese Socialism and the Twentieth-Century World
(Asian Studies 331)
Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.
During the last two decades, China has emerged as a world superpower, transforming her image from a poverty-stricken communist country. The Communist Party itself has led the nation's development of a capitalist economy, in contradiction to its official ideology. How can we understand this historical irony? Was Chinese communism, together with world Marxism, defeated by capitalism? What can China's experience with socialism tell us today? To answer these questions, this course will explore various versions of Chinese socialism--anarchism, social democracy as well as Marxism--from the late Qing period to the present.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor. Students who wish to register should fill out the 300-level application form on the History department's website: https://www.mtholyoke.edu/acad/history/300-level_application

(Spring) Research Seminar in American Women's History: Mary Lyon's World and the History of Mount Holyoke
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333ML)
Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.
What world gave rise to Mary Lyon's vision for Mount Holyoke and enabled her to carry her plans to success? What local and global circumstances subsequently shaped the institution and the women who passed through it? How did Mount Holyoke women attempt to fashion the worlds they encountered in and beyond South Hadley and what came of their efforts? We will inquire into the historical arrangements of power—involving race, class, gender, religion, culture, body politics, and colonialism—that formed Mount Holyoke and the world in which it has operated. Students write a substantial research paper based on primary and secondary sources.

(Spring) The Afterlives of Objects: Revisiting Early American and Indigenous Histories through Material Culture - *Not offered this year/term

Material culture studies examine relationships between people and objects. Tangible artifacts like furniture, clothing, ceramics, tools, and buildings give insight into communities' identities, aspirations, and struggles. This course approaches early American and indigenous histories through objects, and considers how interdisciplinary methodologies can reveal alternative understandings of the past. The course traces changing theories and practices of preservation, curation, and display; shifting conceptions of "heritage" among diverse peoples; and ethical challenges posed by Native American items held in museums.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in History

(Spring) Recent American History: The 1960s As History and Myth
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.

This research seminar offers an in-depth opportunity to explore the 1960s. To what extent was it a unique historical era? Does it make sense to think of a "long 1960s," beyond that decade? We will focus on several political and cultural movements, including civil rights, the anti-Vietnam war struggle, the counter culture, the emergence of feminism and gay rights, and the conservative backlash. How do the political, cultural, and intellectual conflicts of that day continue to shape American life today? Each student will write a seminar research paper based on intensive engagement with primary and secondary sources from the era.

(Fall) European Politics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This seminar explores European politics and societies from a transnational and historical comparative perspective. First, we discuss what kind of supranational entity the European Union is in the context of present and classical theories of European integration and supranational cooperation. Second, we explore European societies and public debates through transnational comparison: How do European leaders, journalists, and engaged citizens in different countries define democracy, citizenship, and equality in the context of globalization in comparison to North Americans or citizens in other regions?
Prerequisites: Politics 116
Instructors: N. Doerr
Expected enrollment: 40

IR-237-01 - International Relations - 2015-2016
(Fall) International Human Rights - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides an introduction to the basic concepts of, and issues in, international human rights. Prior to World War II, there was very little focus on the question of human rights within the international system and within the discipline of international relations. Since that time we have seen a significant expansion of human rights theory, practice, and institutions. This course outlines the historical ideational and institutional developments of human rights. It exposes students to a range of theoretical propositions and empirical findings to understand the role (and limits) of human rights in the international system today.
Prerequisites: Politics 116 or permission of instructor
Instructors: J. Western

(Fall) Global Resource Politics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
An intensive examination of the international politics surrounding disputes over the ownership, extraction, and vital natural resources including fresh water, petroleum, arable land, timber, minerals, and oceanic fisheries. The course will assess the growing pressures being brought to bear on the world's resource base, including population growth, globalization, unsustainable consumption, and climate change. It will also examine the various ways (war, adjudication, conservation, innovation) in which various actors (states, regional and international organizations, multinational corporations, warlords, civil society groups, and so on) are responding to contemporary resource disputes.

(Fall) Media and the Public Sphere in Europe & the United States
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Understanding media systems and the democratic role of the public is relevant to policy makers working in globalized societies. How do journalists and leaders communicate toward different media audiences and international arenas? What is the role of the internet and social media for non-state actors communicating across borders? An interdisciplinary perspective on theories of democracy and public space using case studies in Europe and the United States.

(Fall) Transnational Social Movements in World Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
How do multinational corporations, interest groups, NGOs, and social movements engage in world politics? In exploring this question, this course provides an introduction to the study of transnationally operating non-state actors and transnational social movements. First, we will look at the influence of movements on inter-state relations and on inter-national organizations. Second, we will investigate their increasing involvement in global governance. The class concludes with recent debates on the global economic crisis and conflict resolution and on global immigration, politicization, and democratization through social movements and new media.

IR-305-01 - International Relations - 2015-2016
(Spring) International Society - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
An intensive reading course in theories of international society: the idea that states and peoples are or should be linked to each other through a web of shared values and institutions. It focuses on the work of Hedley Bull, Immanuel Kant, and John Rawls. How did these three men understand international society? What are or should be the values and institutions that give rise to it and support it? What implications do their visions of international society have for war and peace, state sovereignty, religion, democracy, capitalism, distributive justice, human rights, and international law? What responses and criticisms have their arguments engendered?

(Spring) Culture and Social Movements - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
How do cultural diversity and inequality influence cooperation among NGOs and social movements cooperating in complex transnational environments and multicultural organizations on the ground? This course provides an introduction to the study of culture, including debates about class, race, and gender, nationality, language, and religion. First, we will investigate culture within transnationally operating non-state organizations such as NGOs and activist groups. Second, we will look at culture as a set of discourses and practices including news media analysis and the role of social media and cultural and political translation practices used by the most recent wave of global protests for equality, justice, and democracy.

(Spring) Democratization in the Middle East and North Africa - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides a historical, theoretical, and empirical foundation to comprehend and question complex dynamics of political change and democratization in the Middle East. In Spring 2011, the region entered an irreversible process of political change and democratization despite strong authoritarian backlash. We will explore: What are the underlying socio-economic causes that led to the eruption of the revolution? What are the Islamic movements and what is their role in political change in the region? What explains the electoral success of Islamic-leaning parties in almost all free and fair elections in this region? Why was the Arab Spring largely contained in authoritarian republics?

(Spring) Globalization and the Muslim World - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course challenges students to explore and understand the Muslim world in a new era characterized by globalization, and to examine its various effects on the Islamic world. Though politics of the Muslim world has been largely studied with exclusive reference to states, the course encourages students to look beyond this statist paradigm to salient non-state actors. It provides a conceptual and theoretical framework helpful in examining various cases and issues pertaining to the process of globalization and the Muslim world, such as: transnational Islamic movements and networks, Muslims in global business or living as minorities, Islamic legal and moral doctrines, gender and human rights.

(Fall) European Politics and Public Debate in Times of Crisis - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This seminar explores European politics from a transnational comparative perspective. It explores what kind of supranational entity the European Union is in the context of theories of international organization. Second, it considers public debates through methods of discourse analysis: How do European leaders, journalists, and engaged citizens or protesters define and 'frame' democracy and social justice in comparison to American or Middle Eastern ones?
Prerequisites: Politics 116
Instructors: N. Doerr
Expected enrollment: 19

IR-365-01 - International Relations - 2015-2016
(Fall) Ethics and International Relations - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Do ethical considerations matter in international relations? Should they? These questions are examined from the perspective of Western writers on these specific issues: just war, intervention, human rights, weapons of mass destruction, and distributive justice. The course also considers challenges to the international system posed by the critiques and responses of non-Western states and peoples.
Prerequisites: Politics 116, 8 credits in international relations
Instructors: S. Hashmi

ITAL-225-01 - Italian - 2015-2016
(Spring) A Different Language Is a Different Vision of Life: Contemporary Italy through Cinema - *Not offered this year/term
(Taught in English)
Film director Federico Fellini said that a "different language is a different vision of life." How has the Italian "vision of life" changed from Mussolini's dictatorship to Berlusconi's government? From the birth of the Republic in 1946 to the debate ignited by Roberto Saviano's bestseller Gomorrah, this course traces transformations in modern Italian society. Through historical and literary readings, films, and the media, this course explores the difficult path towards modernity Italy has traveled in the last five decades. We will explore contemporary popular culture and films that reflect these transformations and analyze family, religion, gender, sexuality, and class conflict.

ITAL-251-01 - Italian - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Italian: La Bella Figura: Fashion and Design in Italian Culture
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
Italian designers from "il bel paese" (the beautiful country) have been at the center of the fashion industry for a long time. More than a business for Italians, fashion is intrinsic to their national identity. The notion of "bella figura"—appearing elegant and appropriate in any situation—is often considered a crucial aspect of being Italian. We explore cultural and literary trends that brought bella figura into national debate. Using texts such as Castiglione's Cortegiano, works of painter and stage designer Domenico Gnoli, and fashion magazines and documentaries, students will look at the evolution of Italian fashion over the centuries. Museum trips and guest lectures.

(Spring) Introduction to Judaism - *Not offered this year/term
(Religion 112)
Judaism is a 3,500-year-old tradition that has developed over time as Jewish communities all over the world creatively interacted with the different cultural and historical milieus in which they lived. This course explores the ways in which Judaism has sought to transform ordinary life into sacred life. What are the ways in which Judaism conceives of God, and what is the meaning of life? What roles do study, prayer, ethics, sex, marriage, family, rituals of the life cycle, and community play in Judaism? These and other questions will be taken up through study of diverse types of religious literature and historical evidence.

(Spring) Introduction to Jewish Mysticism - *Not offered this year/term
(Religion 235)
Mysticism refers to a type of religious life in which individuals seek intimate and personal, direct and intense experience of the Divine. There exists a rich and fascinating Jewish mystical tradition with hundreds of books of diverse kinds. This course examines the Kabbalah of thirteenth-century Spain, focusing upon the seminal work of this period, the Zohar; the synthesis of mysticism and messianism that occurred in the city of Safed (in the Land of Israel) in the sixteenth century; and the popular pietistic movement of Eastern Europe from the eighteenth century forward, Hasidism; and various expressions of mystical spirituality in our own time.

JWST-256-01 - Jewish Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) What Didn’t Make It in the Bible - *Not offered this year/term
(Religion 256)
Hundreds of ancient religious texts did not make it into the Hebrew Scripture (aka the Old Testament). This course examines some of these excluded writings. In particular, we will focus on works found among the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, and the Dead Sea Scrolls, We will read an ancient Harlequin romance, tour heaven and hell, hear of the adventures of fallen angels who sired giants (and taught humans about cosmetics), and learn how the world will end. In critically examining such texts, we will better appreciate the diversity of Judaism, better understand the historical context of early Christianity, and explore the politics behind what did and did not make it into the bible.

(Fall) Roma Ludens: Comedy and Satire in Ancient Rome - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
Could Romans be funny? Perhaps surprisingly, in a culture where seriousness (gravitas) and sternness (severitas) were praiseworthy attributes, Romans enjoyed theatrical productions adapted from Greek comedies - from raucous and ribald farces to more subtle comedies of manners. They also believed that satire, poetry that poked fun at the vices and foibles of human nature, was a truly Roman genre. Moreover, both comic and satirical elements appear in a wide range of Roman literature. Authors may include Plautus, Terence, Horace, Ovid, Martial, Juvenal, and others.
Prerequisites: Latin 222 or permission of instructor; 2 meetings (75 minutes)

(Fall) Topics in Latin American Studies: Imagining Cuba: Between History and Memory - *Not offered this year/term
This course introduces students to critical and creative works that center Cuba and its diasporas. The primary questions of the course are: How have authors variously imagined Cuba over time and across space? How are these imaginings of Cuba politically, economically, and culturally situated? Students will question the personal/national and the public/private across a range of texts that explore issues of exile, nostalgia, memory, and nationalism. Readings include works by Cristina Garcia, Ana Menendez, Pablo Medina, Achy Obejas, Roberto G. Fernandez, Carmelita Tropicana, Richard Blanco, and Rachel Kushner and readings by Gustavo Perez Firmat, Sheila Croucher, and Louis A. Perez, Jr.

Instructors: J. Hernandez

(Spring) Topics in Latin American Studies: Rethinking (Under)Development in Latin America
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Critical Social Thought 256)

When and how did the notion of "development" emerge and spread? Why does nearly every country now aspire to it? What stigmas and hierarchies does the term "under-development" imply? Throughout Latin America, such terms prove highly problematic not only with respect to the material reality they purport to describe but also as a framework for understanding place, time, and selfhood. In this course, students rethink conventional wisdom about "underdevelopment" through the study of writers, filmmakers, and painters from Latin America working at different historical junctures of the twentieth century.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333CL, Latina/o Studies 350CL, English 392CL)

This seminar surveys works by Chicana and Latina authors. Selections from critical/theoretical works will situate our reading of literature produced by Chicana/Latina authors in the United States. Readings of novels, short stories, poems, essays, and plays by Chicana, Cuban American, Puerto Rican, and Dominican American authors provide students with a range of experiences and literary styles. Students will ask how the diversity of these texts bespeaks a shared or distinct experience across differences. Particular attention will be given to the challenges that Chicana/Latina writers pose towards nationalist movements, literary genres, cultural production, and feminisms.

(Spring) Special Topics in Latin American Studies: Fighting Words: Imperial Discourses and Resistance in the Americas - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 350FW)

In 1492, the Spanish conquest forever changed indigenous America and created a new world. European imperial discourses collided with resistance movements and the emerging voices of oppressed peoples, including indigenous peoples, women, and mestizos. This course traces the tensions between imperialist and resistance discourses during both the colonial period and today. We will analyze the literary "fighting words" that consolidated the Spanish empire and later opened the path to Latin American independence. Tracing the impact of these struggles on the Americas today, we will examine how subaltern communities currently fight to make their voices heard in a globalized world.

Latina/o Studies

(Fall) Introduction to Latina/o Studies: Social and Cultural Articulations
(Community-based learning course; Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course offers an introduction to the study of Latina/o communities in the United States. We will explore major concepts and debates in the growing field of Latina/o Studies, through the study of texts across disciplines including history, sociology, performance theory, personal narrative and ethnography. This interdisciplinary approach will provide us with rich frameworks to interrogate how Latinas/os negotiate complex identities across communities and specific geographic and political contexts.

Instructors: J. Hernandez
Expected enrollment: 16

(Spring) Introduction to Latina/o Literatures
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 218LS, Gender Studies 204LS)

We will explore a number of readings across different genres (the novel, play, poem, short story, graphic novel). Students will endeavor to understand how each author defines Latinidad. What characterizes Latina/os for each of these writers and how do their works articulate the historical conditions out of which they emerge? How is Latina/o literature marked by notions of language, nationality, gender, sexuality, class, race, politics, form, and genre? The readings will provide both a survey of general ideas in the study of Latina/o literatures as well as specific case studies and historical examples. The reading list is not meant to be comprehensive but to provide a sampling of texts.

Instructors: J. Hernández
Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) Afro-Latina/o Diasporic Performance - *Not offered this year/term
This course offers an introduction to the study of Latina/o communities in the United States. We will explore major concepts and debates in this growing field through the study of texts across disciplines including history, sociology, performance theory, personal narrative and ethnography. (Spring) Latina Theatre and Performance - *Not offered this year/term
(Theatre Arts 234LT)
This course offers transnational approaches to the theory and political practice of performance in the Americas with a focus on work by Latinas in the United States and women in Latin America. We will interrogate the ways in which race, sexuality, class, gender, indigenous and diasporic identities inform the methodological and aesthetic mandates of an array of artists from across disciplines. Employing multiple modes of performance from theater, dance, performance art, ritual, visual art, and folkloric music, we will explore how these practices have functioned and continue to allow for politically subversive or resistant transformation.

Instructors: M. Díaz-Sánchez

Expected enrollment: 20

(Fall) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Latina/o Urbanism(s)
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Sociology 216LR)
This course will examine the urban as a social, political, cultural, and economic formation, and set of social relations, with focus on Latina/o identities and culture(s). Urban scholars have long studied the changing and evolving city -- this course explores this notion in relation to Latina/o research, populations, and urban social change movements. We will examine historical and contemporary conditions and cover a broad range of topics including: urbanization, urban planning, place-making, social policy, migration/immigration, segregation, urban education, language, and more.

(Fall) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Race, Racism, and Power
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course analyzes the concepts of race and racism from an interdisciplinary perspective. Students will be asked to bring a critical lens to the ubiquitous, yet frequently misunderstood concepts of race and racism. We will study the sociocultural, political, economic, and historical forces that collaborate and compete with one another in the production of racial categories. This approach will require us to draw connections between wide-scale processes and everyday interactions. This will involve a consideration of a range of issues and concepts, including colonialism, nation, multiculturalism, representation, and violence. The analysis that we develop will ultimately allow us to think rigorously about social inequality, difference resistance, and liberation.

(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Scholarly Pathways: Research, College Achievement and Post-Baccalaureate Futures
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Educational Studies 250SP)
This course demystifies college by focusing on three areas: 1) benefits of undergraduate research, 2) how to capitalize on the college experience, and 3) how to prepare for post-baccalaureate opportunities. Specifically, this course will teach students the elements of a research proposal by guiding them... with original research. Moreover, students will learn strategies to thrive as undergraduates by exploring interests as means to finding their passion. In addition, this course will decipher the graduate/professional school application process. The overall goal of this course is to encourage and empower students to take their education and pre-professional experience into their own hands and equip them with the necessary tools to be successful.

Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: The Undocumented Latina/o Youth Experience: Struggles, Resiliency, and Futures
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides an overview of the immigrant rights movement, emphasizing diverse undocumented Latina/o students throughout the K-20 pipeline. Readings and discussions will: address the socio-political construction of "illegality"; critically examine the creation and implementation of pro- and anti-immigrant legislation, particularly policies that impact undocumented students; survey the challenges and resiliency of the undocumented youth movement as it pertains to education, social mobility, and health; and deconstruct the legislative, political, economic, and cultural factors that impact the undocumented community in the U.S.

(Spring) Latina Feminisms - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333EE)
This course offers an interdisciplinary approach to the study of feminist ideologies among Latinas throughout the United States. Employing a range of sources from archival texts to artistic images and ethnographies, we will study the histories and representations of Latina feminist theories across academic and aesthetic approaches. Focusing on the multiplicity of lived experiences among Puertorriquenas, Chicanas, Mexicanas, Centroamericanas, Dominicanas, Suramericanas, and many other communities in the United States, we will interrogate how gender and sexuality have informed the development of Latina feminist movements and political histories.

(Spring) Modern Families: Race/Ethnicity, Kinship and U.S. Popular Culture
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333FA)
This course examines the social construction of the family unit in the United States across a range of historical periods and cultural texts. Students will dismantle universalist notions of what constitutes a family (particularly the nuclear family), understanding it instead as a social unit articulated by issues of race/ethnicity, gender, and sexuality and (re)produced with spatial and temporal specificities. Engaging first with historical texts to understand kinship as a legal, political and economic project, we will then turn to cultural production to investigate the role that literature, film, television, and art play in reifying, challenging, and/or reproducing the family.
Instructors: J. Hernández
Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) Race and Representation in Latina/o Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 370RR)
This seminar offers an interrogation of the ways in which Latinas and Latinos are represented in the cinema. We will explore early portrayals of Latinas and Latinos in film history and then explore contemporary cinema with a focus on race, class, gender and sexuality in these representations. Employing multiple aesthetic and disciplinary approaches we will analyze commercial films alongside independent films with particular attention to the market-driven and political mandates of these projects. We will focus on films by both Latina/o filmmakers and non-Latina/o filmmakers interrogating the multifarious points of entry of these artists.
Instructors: M. Díaz-Sánchez
(Spring) Visualizing Immigrant Narratives: Migration in Film - *Not offered this year/term
This course offers an interrogation of overt and embedded narratives of migrants and the migration process in popular and documentary film, paying specific attention to cinematic representations of non-citizen bodies confronting migration, deportation, labor, acculturation, and anti-immigrant hysteria. Film screenings and class discussions comprise the interpretative lens through which students will examine the aesthetic, cultural, economic, gendered, historical, political, racial and sexual dimensions of cultural texts. The course is supplemented with readings about immigration policies and histories.
Prerequisites: jr, sr
Notes: Plus 2-3 special screenings
Instructors: D. Hernandez

(Fall) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Chicana/Latina Feminist Literature and Thought
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333CL, Latin American Studies 387CL, English 392CL)
This seminar surveys works by Chicana and Latina authors. Selections from critical/theoretical works will situate our reading of literature produced by Chicana/Latina authors in the United States. Readings of novels, short stories, poems, essays, and plays by Chicana, Cuban American, Puerto Rican, and Dominican American authors provide students with a range of experiences and literary styles. Students will ask how the diversity of these texts bespeaks a shared or distinct experience across differences. Particular attention will be given to the challenges that Chicana/Latina writers pose towards nationalist movements, literary genres, cultural production, and feminisms.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Instructors: J. Hernandez
Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Critical Race Theory in Education
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Education 351RT)
This course focuses on Critical Race Theory, its history and application in the field of Education. Through course readings and assignments, students will explore and discuss key issues such as race/racism, class/classism, gender/sexism among other "isms" and how they impact the teaching and learning experiences of students of color. This course is specifically designed to challenge students and make them think critically about their multiple identities, privileges and challenges as students and future leaders. The goal is gain a critical understanding of the connection between theory, research, and practice in order to better understand educational structures, processes, and discourses.
Notes: Students interested in careers within Education are highly encouraged to enroll.
Instructors: A. Soltero-López
Expected enrollment: 19

(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Latina Feminism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Gender Studies 333FM)
This interdisciplinary course explores Latina feminism as a distinct mode of thought and inquiry. In particular, we will examine how Latina feminist approaches inform our research questions, allow us to analyze women's experiences and women's history, and challenge patriarchy and gender inequality. We will explore topics related to the politics of feminist analysis, representation, colonialism and empire, and Latina feminist methodologies. Our approach in this class will employ an interlocking analysis to feminist theory that understands the interconnectedness between multiple forms of oppression, including race, class, sexuality, and ability. Our goal is to develop an understanding of how Latina feminist methodology and epistemology can be tools for social change.

MATH-100-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Precalculus
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is intended for students who, based on the results of their precalculus assessment and the agreement of the instructor, need to strengthen their quantitative and algebraic precalculus skills in order to be ready to progress to calculus. Features the study of functions, including trigonometric functions, the exponential function, and logarithms, and the phenomena they model.

Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Send score from math online self-assessment and background information to robinson@mtholyoke.edu

Instructors: M. Robinson

Expected enrollment: 25

(Fall) Calculus I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is for students who have not studied calculus and who have the necessary precalculus background. It presents rates of change and their applications, integrals, the fundamental theorem, and modeling of phenomena in the natural and social sciences. All students are required to complete the online self assessment of precalculus skills before the course begins.
Instructors: A. Hoyer-Leitzel

Expected enrollment: 35

MATH-102-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Calculus II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): Most students who have taken calculus in high school begin with Calculus II. In particular, if you have studied the derivative and its applications and have been introduced to the definite integral, you will be prepared for Calculus II. Please read the "Beginning the Study of Mathematics" section.
Topics include techniques of integration, applications of integration, differential equations, sequences, series, and Taylor series.
Instructors: The department

MATH-110-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Entropy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
First-year seminar
This course will explore the scientific, technological, and philosophical significance of the development of thermodynamics. The formulation of the laws of thermodynamics had profound implications for our understanding of the universe. The Second Law of Thermodynamics says, roughly, that the entropy of the universe is always increasing, and it had a deeply destabilizing effect on our Enlightenment image of a clockwork universe that is ordered and unchanging. We will study the laws of thermodynamics and their impact on science, art, literature, and society. Topics may include heat engines, reversible and irreversible processes, chaos, the heat death of the universe, Maxwell's Demon, information theory, and the directionality of time.
Instructors: D. Shepardson

MATH-114-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Explorations in Number Theory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
We will cover the arithmetic of whole numbers and of prime numbers, in particular, examining some of the earliest questions in mathematics from a modern perspective, finding whole number solutions to equations with several variables, deciding whether or not such solutions exist and if so, determining whether the solution set is finite or infinite. Topics include the theory of "finite arithmetic," converting questions about the infinite set of whole numbers to those involving just a small set of primes, using computers to examine problems numerically.
Prerequisites: a good grasp of arithmetic
Instructors: the department

MATH-251-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Laboratory in Mathematical Experimentation - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Offers mathematics as a laboratory science. After a short introduction to the computer, uses hand and computer computation to explore mathematical ideas. Directs laboratory projects toward discovery of properties and patterns in mathematical structures. The choice of projects varies from year to year and is drawn from algebra, analysis, discrete mathematics, geometry, and statistics.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 102, or permission of instructor

MATH-311-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Abstract Algebra
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Topics include algebraic structures: groups, rings (including some elementary number theory), fields, and vector spaces.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 211 and 232, or permission of instructor
Instructors: J. Sidman
Expected enrollment: 20

MATH-319-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Topics in Algebra: Combinatorial Commutative Algebra
How can we use graphs to answer questions about polynomials or use algebra to answer questions about graphs? This class will explore connections between graph theory and abstract algebra. Topics will include graph theory, simplicial complexes, and polynomial rings and ideals.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 211; Mathematics 232 or 311 recommended
Instructors: J. Biemann
MATH-319-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016

(Spring) Topics in Geometry and Topology: To Be Announced - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This is an introduction to point-set topology (also referred to as general topology). Point-set topology is one branch of the much broader area, topology. It is concerned with the study of properties of abstract topological spaces and structures related to such spaces. The material covered in this course will provide the common foundation for courses in algebraic topology, geometric topology, and differential topology. The core topics to be studied include: basic set theory, various interesting topologies, continuous functions, connectedness and compactness, separation axioms, countability axioms, nets and filters.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 203, 211 and 301, or permission of the instructor
Notes: this course may be repeated for credit
Instructors: The department

MATH-333-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Differential Equations
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This is an introduction to differential equations for students in the mathematical or other sciences. Topics include first-order equations, second-order linear equations, qualitative study of dynamical systems, and first- and second-order linear partial differential equations.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 211 or permission of instructor
Instructors: A. Hoyer-Leitzel
Expected enrollment: 40

MATH-339-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Topics in Applied Mathematics: Optimization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Mathematical optimization involves finding the best solution to a problem from a set of feasible solutions defined by mathematical constraints. It has an elegant theory and applications in fields like management, economics, engineering, and computer science that require decision making under constraints on time or other resources. We will begin by studying linear optimization, including duality, the simplex algorithm, and the geometry of linear programming. Other topics will include discrete optimization, network optimization, and nonlinear optimization.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 211 or permission of instructor
Instructors: D. Shepardson
Expected enrollment: 20

MATH-339-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Applied Mathematics: The Spectral Theorem
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In linear algebra the spectral theorem describes a linear operator in terms of its eigenvectors and eigenvalues, that is, its spectrum. The extension to infinite dimension includes differential and integral operators. The course will consider the finite dimensional case rigorously and explore analogous infinite dimensional cases through their motivating examples.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 203 and 211
Instructors: M. Peterson
Expected enrollment: 25

MATH-342-01 - Mathematics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Probability
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course develops the ideas of probability simultaneously from experimental and theoretical perspectives. The laboratory provides a range of experiences that enhance and sharpen the theoretical approach and, moreover, allows us to observe regularities in complex phenomena and to conjecture theorems. Topics include: introductory experiments; axiomatic probability; random variables, expectation, and variance; discrete distributions; continuous distributions; stochastic processes; functions of random variables; estimation and hypothesis testing.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 203
Notes: offered alternate years at Mount Holyoke and Smith Colleges; offered at Mount Holyoke in fall 2015 and 2017.
Instructors: A. Foulkes
Expected enrollment: 30

Medieval Studies
(Spring) Topics in Medieval Studies: The Curious Middle Ages
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; English 214CM)
While influenced by Augustine's warning that worldly inquiry could endanger the pilgrimage of the soul, medieval literature contains many instances of curious looking. Exploring the medieval desire to know, this course considers how the period's tendencies toward spiritual and metaphysical thought are balanced against its fascinations with the observable world. We will study the ways allegories, travel narratives, romances, and dream visions intersect with natural philosophy, historiography, cartography, and architecture. Literary analysis is the basis for our investigative work to uncover the epistemological impulses that inform medieval art and literature.
Prerequisites: FYSEM; ENGL 210 or ENGL 213 or HIST 115 or HIST 232 also recommended

MEDST-300-01 - Medieval Studies - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar in Medieval Studies: Early Muslim/Christian Encounters - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Religion 337MC)
This course explores a set of recently discovered documents that substantially changes our understanding of Christian/Muslim relations. We will read texts such as a Christian/Muslim debate, a bishop's letter on how to bribe Muslim rulers, and an exorcism account concerning demon-possessed monks. Students will be among the first in a thousand years to read these works providing them with a strong knowledge of the history of Christianity, of Islam, and of their first interactions with each other.

Music

MUSIC-100-01 - Music - 2015-2016
(Fall) Rudiments of Music
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this half-semester course students will become familiar with the elements of music notation (staves, clefs, pitch names, note and rest values) and with some of the basic skills necessary for college-level music instruction (e.g., construction and identification of scales, intervals, triads, and basic diatonic functions).
Notes: Meets for only the first half of each semester.

(Spring) Music and Technology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
It is now possible to record, manipulate, notate, and compose music with a variety of powerful and flexible tools using the personal computer. This course will focus on hands-on experience with various sorts of music software, including recording and editing, mixing, synthesis and MIDI interfaces, notation, and various instructional programs. In the process of experimenting with these tools and operating on their favorite musical styles, students will learn a good bit of notation, ear training, and rudimentary principles of arrangement and composition. Basic computer literacy (such as comfort with basic editing commands and the concept of keyboard shortcuts) is required.

(Fall) The Hyperbolic World of Opera in 25 Episodes -- An Introduction to Western Classical Opera from the Renaissance to the Present
Day - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course begins with the birth of opera at the end of the Renaissance Period, and ends with some of the most successful operas in the past decade. Our investigation includes operas in English, French, German, Italian and Russian. Alongside an introduction to the materials of opera, from vocal fachs, forms, and styles, to vocal virtuosity, the course situates opera as a cultural phenomenon by considering the unique set of historical, intellectual, social, political and economic conditions of each work of art. The course includes some opera projections; each one is preceded by an introduction of the period in which it was first performed and is followed by class discussion.

(Fall) Basic Musicianship
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Explores the ways in which sound is organized into musical structures. Topics include the physical properties of sound; the basic vocabulary of Western music (scales, key signatures, intervals, triads, rhythm, meter); and an introduction to musical form and analysis. Includes extensive practice in music reading, sight singing, ear training, and critical listening.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Adventures in Music
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Designed for students with or without prior musical experience, "Adventures in Music" explores the materials of music. Through reading, hands-on interaction with instruments and their players, discussions and recordings, students will explore concepts of pitch, time, space, structure and timbre, thereby enriching their perception of the world of sound. The best way to access the indescribable in music is often to make music. With this in mind the class will embark in mini composition projects culminating in a final project that utilizes the knowledge acquired over the duration of the course.

(Spring) Topics in Music: Race in the American Musical
The history of musical theater in the United States is bound up with race on multiple levels: from the problematic legacies of vaudeville and minstrelsy, to the phenomenon of all-black, all-white, and purposely integrated musical casts, to issues of genre and identity in pop, rock, and hip hop musicals. In this course, we will survey selected major works in the history of musical theater from the perspective of race, including Show Boat, Porgy and Bess, South Pacific, West Side Story, and Rent. Our guiding question will be: what is musical about race in the musical? How does the spectacle of the singing body, the longevity of the catchy show tune, and the transmission of music via the web and social media affect the way Broadway's creators and audiences negotiate power, inequality, and representation?
Notes: The course will include student-moderated Q&As with faculty in Africana Studies and Theatre Arts, and will culminate in a field trip to New York to view productions of Hamilton and/or Shuffle Along, followed by a student-led public symposium and workshop.

(Fall) World Music
(Writing-intensive)
This course is a survey of selected musical traditions from different parts of the world, including Africa, Indonesia, Indian, the Caribbean, and the United States. The course adopts an ethnomusicological approach that explains music as a cultural phenomenon, and explores the social and aesthetic significance of musical traditions within their respective historical and cultural contexts. It examines how musical traditions change over time, and how such changes reflect and relate to social and political changes within a given society. Weekly reading and listening assignments provide the basis for class discussions. Students are expected to undertake a final project in music ethnography.

(Fall) Advanced Interdisciplinary Topics: Art, Music and the Brain
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Biologic Sciences 321AM)
Art and music are a part of all human cultures. Is there something about the human brain that drives us to paint and sing? We will examine how the brain simultaneously processes different aspects of visual and auditory stimuli, ask how this processing may affect the way we do art and music, and explore where these phenomena may occur in the brain. As we engage in discussion and hands-on activities, we will discover the commonalities between the arts and the sciences including practice, experimentation, exploration, innovation, and creativity.
Prerequisites: seniors with at least 8 credits at the 200 level in biology, neuroscience and behavior, studio art, art history, or music
Notes: For music students; permission required from Prof. Laderach

(Fall) Topics in Music: Music and Childhood in the Western Tradition
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This course examines significant moments in the history of children as creators, performers, consumers, and subjects of music in the Western tradition. From Mozart to Michael Jackson, medieval psalmody to Debussy's Children's Corner and beyond, we will survey the enlisting of children, childhood, and the childlike across a range of musical genres and pedagogical, aesthetic, and cultural-political agendas. For their final project, students may work with a historical artifact of children's musical culture, or research a local children's music program or ensemble.
Prerequisites: Music 282 and 232 or permission of instructor
Instructors: A. Mueller
Expected enrollment: 7

(Spring) Advanced Seminar in Ethnomusicology
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Anthropology 316ET)
Designed for music and non-music majors, this advanced seminar examines core theoretical and methodological issues in ethnomusicology and the debates that have shaped its practice since its origins in the early twentieth century as comparative musicology. Drawing on musical traditions from different parts of the world and supplemented by workshops conducted by visiting professional musicians, the course explores the interdisciplinary approaches that inform how ethnomusicologists study the significance of music "in" and "as" culture. Topics covered will include ethnographic... methods, the intersection of musicological and anthropological perspectives, the political significance of musical hybridity, applied ethnomusicology, and sound studies.

Neuroscience and Behavior

NEURO-100-01 - Neuroscience and Behavior - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introduction to Neuroscience and Behavior
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This comprehensive survey course explores the brain and the biological basis of behavior. We will examine the anatomy of the nervous system and the unique properties of the cells that make up the brain. We will discuss the mechanisms by which individual brain cells communicate with each other, and how small networks of cells underlie more complex processes such as perception, learning, and behavior. In labs, students will perform experiments that expand upon and reinforce these ideas through hands-on exercises.
Prerequisites: fy or permission from Ken Colodner

NEURO-101-01 - Neuroscience and Behavior - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: College Cognition
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
First-year seminar
This course seeks to examine, from a molecular to a social-cognition level, the neurobiological and psychological underpinnings of successful study habits (both within and outside the classroom), as well as to investigate other elements that may impinge on effective study. Through lectures, discussions of readings from both textbook sources and the primary research literature, and experiential exercises, we will consider: mechanisms of memory consolidation and retention (and forgetting), the role of sleep and stimulants in learning and recall, stereotype threat and academic performance, the value of group work, and comparisons of strategies for effective study.

NEURO-309-01 - Neuroscience and Behavior - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Neuroscience and Behavior: The Neurobiology of Stress
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
In this seminar, students will gain a thorough understanding of the stress response system, referred to as the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis. Using primary literature, the course will cover various facets of the HPA axis, including the cellular and anatomical neuroscience behind the stress response. Students will gain an understanding of the techniques commonly used to assess acute and chronic HPA axis activity and behavioral reactivity in humans and in a variety of non-human animals. We will explore how genes and the environment interact to determine how an individual will respond to a stressor and examine irregular activity of the HPA axis in neuropsychiatric disorders, including Anxiety, Depression, and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.
Prerequisites: Neuroscience and Behavior majors. Psych 200 or Bio 220 preferred.
Instructors: A. Hamel

NEURO-324-01 - Neuroscience and Behavior - 2015-2016
(Spring) Cellular and Molecular Neuroscience
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course will explore cellular and molecular mechanisms of nervous system development and function through lectures, laboratory exercises, and the critical analysis of primary literature. Topics include synapse formation and synaptic transmission, neuronal-glial interactions, the molecular basis of behavior, and applied genetic engineering techniques.
Prerequisites: Neuroscience and Behavior 100 and Biological Sciences 220
Notes: This course meets the 300-level laboratory-based course requirement for the Neuroscience and Behavior major.
Instructors: K. Colodner

Philosophy

PHIL-101-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introduction to Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will explore topics that philosophers have grappled with for thousands of years, and that still undergird (or sometimes threaten to undermine) our understanding of the world, our knowledge, ourselves, and each other. In historical and modern texts of the Western intellectual tradition, we will discuss questions such as: Are we all selfish? What makes right actions right, if anything? Do you know anything at all about the future? Are you really free if your actions are caused? This class is for first and second year students who know nothing about philosophy, and want to know whether they will be interested in it. Students with some exposure to, and interest in, the field should take other classes.
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 75
PHIL-102-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: God, Free Will, and Morality
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course will introduce students to philosophy and its methods by looking at what philosophers, past and present, have said about three important and interrelated topics: God, morality, and freedom. We will ask questions such as: Does God exist? Is it rational to believe in God? What should I do if I want to do the right thing? When is it ok to criticize other cultures? How much do I owe to others? Do we have free will? Can we ever be held responsible for anything? Students will come out of the class better thinkers, better writers, and better equipped to tackle difficult questions like these with rigor and care.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: E. Vavova
Expected enrollment: 16

PHIL-102-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: Race, Gender, and the Law - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar
TBA
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: L. Pasquerella
Expected enrollment: 16

PHIL-102-02 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: Being Human
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar
What is it to be human? Does this depend only on human biology? Or does it also imply being distinctively free or autonomous, involving our ability to speak a language, reason, or interact and form communities with other human beings? Is being human equivalent to being a person? Are human beings inherently selfish? If human beings are essentially social animals, how are we so? Are seemingly inescapable features of being human like gender or race based on human biology? Finally, is perhaps being human distinctive because only human beings can raise the question of what it is to be human? What is at stake in raising and answering this question? We will critically examine the answers to this question that readings from both the Western and non-Western intellectual traditions provide.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: J. Koo
Expected enrollment: 16

PHIL-103-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Comparative Introduction to Philosophy
What kind of life should a person live? What can we know about the world? Do we have souls that are separate from our bodies? The aim of the course is to learn how to do philosophy by engaging with philosophical thinkers throughout the globe. We read some philosophers from the Western tradition (such as Plato or Kant) alongside philosophers from other historical traditions, such as the Chinese and Persian traditions (e.g., Laozi or Al-Ghazzali), and we also read some contemporary thinkers from a variety of cultural traditions (such as James Baldwin or Gloria Anzaldúa). This course is equivalent to Philosophy 101.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes)
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 75

PHIL-201-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Philosophical Foundations of Western Thought: The Greek Period
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to ancient Greek philosophy, focusing mainly but not exclusively on the works and ideas of three Athenian philosophers who worked and taught in the period between the Persian Wars and the rule of Alexander the Great, more than 2,300 years ago: Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. Topics to be discussed include: What is the nature of the self? What is reality, and how can it be known? What kind of life should we live? We will work to understand each philosopher's responses to these questions, but we will also learn to develop our own answers. We will take care to place these figures and their works in their historical and cultural context.
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-202-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Philosophical Foundations of Western Thought: The Modern Period
This survey course studies the development of Western philosophy in the 17th and 18th centuries by examining, as possibilities, selected writings of Descartes, Hobbes, Elizabeth of Bohemia, Cavendish, Spinoza, Locke, Berkeley, Leibniz, Conway, Masham, Astell, Hume, and (barely) Kant. Topics include the emerging modern scientific background against which early modern Western philosophy developed; the nature, extent, and limits of human knowledge (early modern epistemology); and the nature of God, fundamental reality, and the mind (early modern metaphysics).

Notes: Prior study of philosophy would be a definite advantage

Instructors: J. Koo

PHIL-208-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016

(Spring) Knowledge and Reality - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course is an introduction to the central topics in epistemology (theory of knowledge) and metaphysics (theory of reality). It will look at questions such as: How is knowledge possible? What is knowledge? Do we know anything? Is time real? What makes you the same person now and in ten years? Could things be otherwise than they are?

Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-209-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016

(Spring) Theories of Probability and Causation

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

In this course we will look at theories of causation, probability, and their interaction. We will look first at Hume on causation, and then move on to some very basic probability theory. We will briefly explore the standard statistical approaches and go on to Bayesian reasoning and confirmation theory. Finally, we'll examine recent developments in the Bayesian Net theory of causation. As a whole, the class is an investigation of recent mathematical and philosophical theories about how science works, what justifies the hypotheses we ought to believe, and how observations could justify hypotheses about unobserved entities and regions.

Prerequisites: One course in either Philosophy or Mathematics or per I.

Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 49

PHIL-210-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016

(Fall) Logical Thought

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course cultivates sound reasoning. Students will learn to see the structure of claims and arguments and to use those structures in developing strong arguments and exposing shoddy ones. We will learn to evaluate arguments on the strength of the reasoning rather than on the force of their associations and buzzwords.

Instructors: B. Yelle
Expected enrollment: 49

PHIL-225-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016

(Spring) Symbolic Logic

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course develops a symbolic system that can be used as the basis for inference in all fields. It will provide syntax and semantics for the language of this system and investigate its adequacy. It provides the basis for all further work in logic or in the philosophical foundations of mathematics. Much of the course has a mathematical flavor, but no knowledge of mathematics is necessary.

Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 75

PHIL-238-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016

Spring Ethics of Career Choice - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Mary Lyon said "When you choose your fields of labor, go where no one else will go." For most students attending a college like Mount Holyoke, one of the most important questions is: what career should I prepare to pursue after graduation? When most of us think about this question, we tend to think about self-centered considerations: what will make us happy, or express our talents, or provide financial independence. This class examines the ethical aspects of choosing a career. Do we have moral responsibilities to others, to ourselves, or to future generations, in choosing our careers? For example, are we obligated to work against social injustice? How should such moral considerations affect this most important of choices?

Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 20

PHIL-242-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Social and Political Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course focuses upon three central areas of political philosophy: Foundational Concepts; The Government, the Economy, and Morality; and Applied Political Philosophy. Within these areas we will consider issues such as: obedience to authority, rights, justice, freedom, equality, as well as more applied and pressing issues such as immigration rights.
Instructors: B. Yelle
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-244-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Philosophy and Literature - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines philosophical themes in literature and philosophical questions about literature. Can literature yield knowledge about the world? What is the meaning of a work of literature, and how can we know it? Are the author's intentions relevant to how a work is to be interpreted? Can works of literature be immoral? How is the identity of the reader relevant to the understanding of a literary work? What is a work of literature? Can a work of literature also be a work of philosophy?
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-248-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Philosophical Issues in Race and Racism
This course examines the nature of race and racism primarily (but not exclusively) from a philosophical perspective. What kind of entity or category is "race"? Is it something real at all? If so, how is it real exactly? If not, what consequences (should) follow from its lack of reality? Do we have to be a member of a "race" in order to (have the right to) know and speak for it? How is race and race-thinking relevant for our personal and group identities? What is the nature of racism? How do race, ethnicity, gender, and class intersect? How legitimate are race-based social policies that aim to bring about social justice or diversity? Readings will come from philosophy and a variety of interdisciplinary texts (e.g., film and other media).
Instructors: J. Koo
Expected enrollment: 49

PHIL-249-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Women and Philosophy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 210)
This course will focus on topics to which feminist thinking has made important philosophical contributions, such as pornography, objectification, and consent. We will draw on a variety of philosophical resources, ranging from liberal and feminist political theory, to speech act theory. We will consider questions such as: Is pornography morally problematic? Can sexism or other biases lead to bad science? Is it wrong to choose to be a stay-at-home parent? The goal will be to see how careful philosophical thought can help us with pressing issues of sex and gender.
Instructors: E. Vavova
Expected enrollment: 40

PHIL-255-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Existentialism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Is life absurd? Do human beings really want to be free? Or do we prefer to sacrifice our freedom for comfort and amusement? Is God dead? Is it possible to live without religious belief? These are among the central questions about human life raised by existentialist thinkers. We will discuss these issues, and many others, through careful reading works of literature and philosophy by such important existentialists as Søren Kierkegaard, Friedrich Nietzsche, Martin Heidegger, Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, Simone de Beauvoir, Franz Fanon, and Samuel Beckett. In addition, we will consider how the existentialists' ideas are reflected in films.
Instructors: T. Wartenberg

PHIL-260-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Topics in Applied Philosophy: Philosophy of Law
PHIL-260-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Applied Philosophy: Medical Ethics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): These courses ask questions about the ethical and/or conceptual problems pertaining to a practice, such as law, medicine, or caring for the natural environment. Such courses are suitable for philosophy majors as well as for students who are new to philosophy but who are interested in the relevant practice.
This course will introduce students to the basic moral principles, reasoning, and arguments operative in a variety of areas within Healthcare Ethics. In order to do this the course will be organized thusly. First, we will consider the nature of moral reasoning as it takes place within Healthcare Ethics. This includes an examination of the moral principles, theories, and considerations that factor into our moral reasoning. Following this, the rest of the course applies this reasoning and these principles to the major topics and issues in Healthcare Ethics.
Instructors: B. Yelle
Expected enrollment: 40

PHIL-264-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Philosophy of Mind - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course explores long-standing questions about the nature of consciousness; the relationship between mind and body; the relationship between mind and language; and the role that science has (if any) in negotiating these questions. The course will emphasize the philosophical understanding and implications of current work in neuroscience.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in department or permission of instructor
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-273-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Philosophy of the Arts
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The purpose of this course is to explore philosophical problems concerning the arts and aesthetic experience. Some questions to be explored include: What is the difference between beauty and moral goodness? Can artistic taste be objective? What does it mean for a work of music to be "sad"? Are the intentions of artists relevant to appreciation? What is the purpose of art criticism? How do pictures represent their objects? Readings will be drawn from both historical and contemporary philosophical writings.
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-275-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Philosophy and Film Theory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 290PT)
An exploration of philosophical and theoretical issues encountered in the study of film such as: Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? There will be weekly required film screenings.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in Philosophy or Film Studies, or permission of instructor
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 screening (1.5 hours)
Instructors: T. Wartenberg
Expected enrollment: 27

PHIL-280-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Philosophy for Children
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Community-based learning course; Speaking-intensive)
When you act bravely, can you be scared? How do you know that you are not dreaming now? If everyone told you you weren't a person, would you believe them? These questions are raised by children's books, such as Frog and Toad Together and The Bear That Wasn't. In this course, you will learn how to conduct discussions of philosophical questions like these among elementary school children using picture books. The first half of the course will concentrate on developing the necessary skills; the second on teaching philosophy to the children. Along the way, we'll delve into a range of philosophical issues, as we prepare to teach an introductory philosophy course for second graders.

Instructors: T. Wartenberg

Expected enrollment: 12
course, we will survey some contemporary attempts to develop and defend moral relativism, as well as some criticisms of these relativist approaches. Our goal will be to assess arguments for and against moral relativism. Prior coursework in ethics and logic is recommended.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department or permission of instructor

Instructors: J. Harold

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-334-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Ethics: Well Being

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course studies issues of current concern in contemporary moral theory, moral psychology, and foundations of ethics.

This seminar will examine the nature of "prudential value" or, more simply, "The Good Life." That is, it is concerned with the question: "What is good for me?" (as opposed to, say, "what is the morally right thing for me to do"). More specifically, we will be considering various versions of the preeminent theories of well-being: Objective-List Theories, Desire-Satisfaction Accounts, and Hedonist theories. We will also be considering how we ought to weigh an individual's doing well (i.e., having a high level of well-being) with, for example, that individual's "doing the right thing" (i.e., acting morally).

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department

Instructors: B. Yelle

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-334-02 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Ethics: Moral Epistemology - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course studies issues of current concern in contemporary moral theory, moral psychology, and foundations of ethics.

This course will focus on a handful of epistemic challenges to morality. We will consider questions such as: How is moral knowledge possible? Can we gain moral knowledge from testimony? What are the implications of the prevalence of moral disagreement? Do our evolutionary origins pose a challenge to our moral beliefs?

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department including Philosophy 205 or permission of instructor

Instructors: E. Vavova

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-350-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Philosophy: Socrates Against the Sophists - *Not offered this year/term

(Classics 349)

In a number of Plato's dialogues we find the character Socrates debating various sophists--itinerant teachers-for-hire whose views were often diametrically opposed to Socrates' own. This seminar is structured around a close, careful reading of three such dialogues: the Euthydemus, the Protagoras, and the Gorgias. These dialogues will offer a general introduction to Socratic philosophy, but we will also focus on a few issues in much greater detail. Chief among those special topics will be questions about the nature and value of moral knowledge, the possibility of moral education, and the efficacy of the Socratic method of inquiry.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in Philosophy or Classics (or in a combination of Philosophy and Classics) or permission of instructor

Instructors: D. Hagen

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-351-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Systematic Study of One Philosopher: Kant

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Immanuel Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is one of the few works in the Western philosophic tradition that fundamentally transformed our understanding of the place of human beings in the world. This seminar involves a careful, critical reading of the text in order to assess the nature and significance of the epistemological and metaphysical views it expounds. There will be frequent, short papers.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department including Philosophy 202 or equivalent

Instructors: T. Wartenberg

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-373-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Spring) Philosophy of Art: Illustration - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This class examines philosophical issues arising concerning the interpretation, creation, and experience of art. Topics vary from year to year. Illustrations surround us, occurring in picture books, scientific texts, fine art editions of books, magazines, and in the pockets of airline seats. Yet there is little philosophical reflection about illustrations and their functions. In this seminar, we will investigate the topic of illustration theoretically and practically. There will be readings, viewings, and studio sessions. Participants will be expected to take part in this approach, producing both written and studio work. Our approach will be eclectic, hoping to educate our eyes, minds, and bodies about this important use of images.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department
Instructors: T. Wartenberg
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-375-01 - Philosophy - 2015-2016
(Fall) Philosophy of Film: Dangerous Movies - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 320PF)

Preamble (for topics courses): An examination of different theoretical issues concerning the nature of film and film viewing. Topics vary yearly.
Many critics considered Kathryn Bigelow’s Zero Dark Thirty to be the best film of 2012, but it was also widely criticized for seeming to promote torture. Movies can be morally dangerous, seemingly endorsing or even promoting immoral or discriminatory ideals, or romanticizing immoral characters and behavior, as in Hannibal Lecter from Silence of the Lambs (Thomas Harris, 1991). In this course, we evaluate the arguments given for treating certain movies as immoral, and we examine whether and how our moral evaluations of movies should affect us. When, if ever, are movies immoral? Should certain movies be censored? Should we withhold praise from morally objectionable movies?

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department or in film studies or permission of instructor
Notes: There will be film screenings in addition to the regular class meeting times
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYED-110-01 - Physical Education and Athletics (Academic Credit) - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Pursuit of Wellness
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
This course examines topics within the physical, mental, psychological and social dimensions of wellness. Current research and trends in health and wellness are emphasized and students will be encouraged to apply this knowledge in practical ways for healthful living. While this course is not activity based, a few classes will involve physical activity to promote wellness.
Prerequisites:
Instructors: L. Priest
Expected enrollment: 16

PHYED-275-01 - Physical Education and Athletics (Academic Credit) - 2015-2016
(Spring) Introduction to Sport Pedagogy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
This course is designed to introduce students to the many facets of sport pedagogy and coaching. Our focus is the strategies and styles of coaching youth sports. Topics include coaching philosophy, motor learning, anatomy and physiology, biomechanics, sport psychology and risk management/liability. Other topics include the benefits of playing sports, developing age-appropriate instruction and training, goal setting, effective feedback, special issues in coaching children, and coaches as role models for children. In a local school system, we will apply the concepts and theories learned, by developing and implementing lesson plans to introduce various athletic skills and sports.
Notes: No PE units awarded.
Instructors: D. Allen
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYED-295-01 - Physical Education and Athletics (Academic Credit) - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Allows academic credit to be given for academic research projects on issues of sports, exercise, and women's health, done under the supervision of department faculty.
Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr, or permission of department

Physics

PHYS-100-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Foundations of Physics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course studies a variety of topics in physics unified by the physical notions of force, energy, and equilibrium. Mathematics is used at the level of geometry, proportion, and dimensional analysis. Topics, drawn from the MCAT syllabus, include geometrical optics, time, oscillation, statics, elasticity, conservation of energy, and fluids.

Expected enrollment: 36

PHYS-104-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Renewable Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Environmental Studies 104)
We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.
Instructors: A. Arango
PHYS-105-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Science in the Media
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)
Popular coverage of science ranges in depth and accuracy, and many scientists do not see the importance of communicating their work, or their excitement, to the general public. Scientific breakthroughs contribute to everyone's quality of life, but the process is poorly understood by many, leading to misunderstandings and misgivings that can affect public policy. This course will look at newsworthy results from current scientific research, exploring topics to better understand the science, ideas such as scientific consensus and repeatability, and examining the tension that may exist between the scientists and the public. Topics will be pulled largely from the physical sciences.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: K. Aidala
Expected enrollment: 16

PHYS-110-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Force, Motion, and Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Studies the mechanics of material objects. Topics include Newton's laws, projectile motion, circular motion, momentum, kinetic and potential energy, angular momentum, gravitation, and oscillations. This course is appropriate for students intending to major in a physical science.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 101/102
Instructors: K. Nordstrom
Section Instructors: 01 LAB T Herd | 02 LAB T Herd |
Expected enrollment: 36

PHYS-110-01 - Physics - 2015-2016

Studies the mechanics of material objects. Topics include Newton's laws, projectile motion, circular motion, momentum, kinetic and potential energy, angular momentum, gravitation, and oscillations. This course is appropriate for students intending to major in a physical science.
Prerequisites: Knowledge of calculus as demonstrated by Math 101 or equivalent
Instructors: K. Nordstrom
Section Instructors: 01 LAB T Herd | 02 LAB T Herd |
Expected enrollment: 32

PHYS-150-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Phenomena of Physics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course studies a variety of topics in physics, drawn from the MCAT syllabus, including thermodynamics, acoustics, wave optics, electricity, magnetism, and nuclear phenomena. As in Physics 103/100, the applicable mathematics is geometry, proportion, and dimensional analysis.
Prerequisites: Physics 100 or 110
Instructors: M. Peterson
Section Instructors: 01 LAB T Herd |
Expected enrollment: 18

PHYS-201-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Electromagnetism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Topics include: electromagnetism, emphasizing fields and energy; electrostatics; electric circuits; magnetism; induction; and electromagnetic radiation. Additional topics chosen according to the interests of the class and instructor.
Prerequisites: Physics 115/110; Mathematics 102/202
Instructors: K. Aidala

Expected enrollment: 32

PHYS-205-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introduction to Mathematical Methods for Scientists
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Topics include infinite series, complex numbers, partial differentiation, multiple integration, selected topics in linear algebra and vector analysis, ordinary differential equations, and Fourier series. The course includes a brief introduction to Mathematica and Matlab, in addition to a traditional emphasis on analytic solutions.
Prerequisites: Physics 190/201 or concurrent enrollment
Instructors: S. Smith
Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department | 02 LAB The department |
Expected enrollment: 25

PHYS-210-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Waves and Optics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A comprehensive treatment of wave phenomena, particularly light, leading to an introductory study of quantum mechanics. Topics include wave propagation, polarization, interference and interferometry, diffraction, and special relativity.
Prerequisites: Electromagnetism (Physics 190/201) and Intro to Math Methods (Physics 200/205) or concurrent enrollment in 205
Instructors: S. Smith
Expected enrollment: 30

PHYS-220-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Intermediate Lab in Physics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This lab-based course is an introduction to modern, investigative, experimental physics. The course is intended as a bridge between the structured introductory lab experience and independent research. Students will engage in a semester-long experimental project, participating in experimental design, construction, debugging and implementation. Students will practice presenting and interpreting experimental results and will be encouraged to develop follow-up experimental questions of their own. This course will also introduce students to scientific communication skills, and is speaking- and writing-intensive.
Prerequisites: Physics 205 and 210, or Physics 205 and concurrent enrollment in Physics 210
Instructors: A. Arango
Expected enrollment: 14

PHYS-222-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Comparativ Biomechanics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Biological Sciences 322)
The main objective of this course is to explore organismal structure and function via an examination of the basic physical principles that guide how living things are constructed and how organisms interact with their environment. We will use the combined approaches of the biologist and engineer to study the impact of size on biological systems, address the implications of solid and fluid mechanics for animal design, survey different modes of animal locomotion, and learn how biologists working in diverse areas (e.g., ecology, development, evolution, and physiology) gain insight through biomechanical analyses.
Prerequisites: Physics 110 and permission of the instructor
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 lab (3 hours) with 12 per lab
Instructors: G. Gillis
Section Instructors: 01 LAB G Gillis | 02 LAB G Gillis |
Expected enrollment: 24

PHYS-231-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Techniques of Experimental Physics
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Provides training in the techniques employed in the construction of scientific equipment.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, major
Notes: 1 meeting (2 hours) for 3 weeks
Instructors: L. McEachern
Expected enrollment: 4
PHYS-231-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Techniques of Experimental Physics
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, major in department
Notes: 1 meeting (2 hours) for 3 weeks
Instructors: L. McEachern
Expected enrollment: 4

PHYS-250-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Quantum Mechanical Phenomena
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an introduction to quantum mechanics. The Uncertainty Principle, Schrödinger's Equation, and the hydrogen atom are studied in depth, with emphasis on angular momentum, electron spin, and the Pauli Exclusion Principle.
Prerequisites: Physics 205 and 210
Instructors: N. Abraham
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-290-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Advanced Laboratory Practicum
Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course is a hands-on practicum, intended to introduce students to the practice of modern physics research. Depending on student interest, topics include external research seminars by practitioners in the field, training in oral and written scientific communication, presentation and interpretation of research results, scientific modeling, and hands-on experimental skills. Research projects are an integral part of this course; credit will be apportioned in relation to the intensity of the project.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in department or permission of instructor.
Instructors: A. Arango
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-295-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: soph, permission of department

Prerequisites: soph, permission of department
Instructors: The department

PHYS-308-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Electronics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is a study of electrical circuits and components with emphasis on the underlying physical principles; solid-state active devices with applications to simple systems such as linear amplifiers; feedback-controlled instrumentation; and analog and digital computing devices.

Prerequisites: Physics 201
Notes: 2 meetings (3 hours: hands-on lecture and lab combined)
Instructors: K. Aidala
Expected enrollment: 14

PHYS-315-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Analytical Mechanics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Newton's great innovation was the description of the world by differential equations, the beginning of physics as we know it. This course studies Newtonian mechanics for a point particle in 1, 2, and 3 dimensions, systems of particles, rigid bodies, and the Lagrangian and Hamiltonian formulations.
Prerequisites: Physics 205
Instructors: K. Nordstrom
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-324-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Methods of Applied Mathematics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is an introduction to theories and techniques important to applied mathematics. Topics include special functions, calculus of variations, theory of functions of a complex variable, solution of partial differential equations, integral transform methods, and Green's functions. While the focus of the course is on analytical techniques, we will develop numerical approaches to problem solving.
Prerequisites: Physics 201,205
Notes: Physics 324 or 336 will normally be offered in alternating years
Instructors: S. Smith
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-325-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Electromagnetic Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course presents the development of mathematical descriptions of electric and magnetic fields; study of interactions of fields with matter in static and dynamic situations; mathematical description of waves; and development of Maxwell's equations with a few applications to the reflection and refraction of light and microwave cavities.
Prerequisites: Intro to Math Methods (Physics 200/205)
Instructors: S. Smith
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-326-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Statistical Mechanics and Thermodynamics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course presents thermodynamic and statistical descriptions of many-particle systems. Topics include classical and quantum ideal gases with applications to paramagnetism; black-body radiation; Bose-Einstein condensation; and the Einstein and Debye solid; the specific heat of solids.
Prerequisites: Intro to Math Methods (Physics 200/205) and Quantum Mechanical Phenomena (Physics 250) or permission from department
Instructors: K. Nordstrom
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-328-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) From Lilliput to Brobdignag: Bridging the Scales Between Science and Engineering - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This performance of many engineered devices is dependent on macroscopic factors (pressure, temperature, flow, conductivity). As a result, engineers often model devices macroscopically considering atomistic level details only through fixed parameters. These parameters do not always capture the full atomistic level picture. More accurate multi-scale approaches for modeling macroscopic properties use basic atomistic level chemistry at key points in larger scale simulations. This course is an introduction to such approaches focusing on fuel cells as a concrete example. Basic scientific principles will be developed along side of basic engineering principles through project/case studies.
Prerequisites: Math 102/202 and Physics 216/190
Instructors: M. Gomez
Expected enrollment: 15
PHYS-329-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Advanced Physics: Topics in Modern Physics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The aim of this course is to provide a survey of modern and advanced ideas in physics that we typically cannot fit into our usual classes. Topics include: Special Relativity, General Relativity (and some Cosmology), Particle Physics, Condensed Matter Physics, and Fluid Dynamics. These are all very broad subjects, so the goal will primarily be to gain an appreciation of the big ideas in each area and learn about connections to current research.
The course will be comprised of lectures, reading and discussion of articles, presentations, and some limited problem sets.
Prerequisites: Physics 205; Physics 250 recommended but not required
Instructors: S. Smith
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-336-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Quantum Mechanics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is an introduction to formal quantum theory: the wave function and its interpretation, observables and linear operators, matrix mechanics and the uncertainty principle; solutions of one-dimensional problems; solutions of three-dimensional problems and angular momentum; and perturbative methods.
Prerequisites: Physics 250
Notes: Physics 324 or 336 will normally be offered in alternating years
Instructors: N. Abraham
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-390-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Advanced Laboratory Practicum
Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course is a hands-on practicum, intended to introduce students to the practice of modern physics research. Depending on student interest, topics include external research seminars by practitioners in the field, training in oral and written scientific communication, presentation and interpretation of research results, scientific modeling, and hands-on experimental skills. Research projects are an integral part of this course; credit will be apportioned in relation to the intensity of the project.
Prerequisites: 16 credits in Physics
Instructors: A. Arango
Expected enrollment: 19

PHYS-395-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, permission of department
Instructors: The department

PHYS-396-01 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Advanced Laboratory Techniques: Quantitative Ultrasound - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
Students will be introduced to quantitative ultrasound imaging. This will be a hands-on course utilizing experimental methods to study the application of ultrasound as a diagnostic tool. We will meet weekly to discuss progress and challenges.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor
Instructors: T. Herd
Expected enrollment: 10

PHYS-396-02 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Advanced Laboratory Techniques: Scanning Probe Microscopy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
Students will be introduced to scanning probe microscopy and pursue projects on a variety of materials systems. This will be a hands-on course with weekly meetings to discuss progress and challenges.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor
Instructors: K. Aidala
Expected enrollment: 10

PHYS-396-03 - Physics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Advanced Laboratory Techniques: Next Generation Solar Cells and LEDs - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
Students will be introduced to solar cell and LED fabrication and characterization techniques, and pursue projects on a variety of materials systems. This will be a hands-on course with weekly meetings to discuss progress and challenges.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor
Instructors: A. Arango
Expected enrollment: 10

Politics

POLIT-100-01 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Speaking and Arguing: The Rhetoric of Peace and War
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)
The art and mechanics of persuading a polity to support either war or peace through oral argument. How speeches frame issues, mobilize public opinion, and persuade individuals to support or resist decisions to go to war. Students will be expected to deliver speeches, lead discussions, and critique their own and others' presentations.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: V. Ferraro
Expected enrollment: 12

POLIT-100-01 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Spring) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Politics and Truth - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
What is the relationship of truth to our political life? Does democracy require truth? Or can democracy pervert truth? Can truth thrive in any type of government? Are these issues more or less relevant for contemporary politics? This course is an introduction to political theory through an examination of these questions. During the semester, students will examine a variety of political theory classics, analyzing the authors' perspectives on these questions.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: E. Markovits
Expected enrollment: 15

POLIT-100-02 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Family Ties
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
In this course, students will engage a number of classic works of literature and philosophy, as well as contemporary works, in order to reflect on the ways the family shapes private and public life and is, in turn, shaped by them. We will cover such questions as: how does the family create and then influence the individual? What does it mean to be part of a family? What do individuals owe their families and are those obligations fair? How do we form families? Can the family insulate individuals from politics and society—in good ways and bad? Is political order like familial order? Are the state and society a threat or support for the family? How have these understandings changed over time?

Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: E. Markovits
Expected enrollment: 16

POLIT-100-02 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Spring) First-Year Seminars in Politics: What in the World is Going On?
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
We know the world faces several profound problems that may well threaten the long-term sustainability of life as we know it: environmental degradation and resource limits, deepening global inequality, global corporate capitalism, and ineffective national and international political institutions. To respond wisely, we must understand the complex interlocking systems we loosely name contemporary globalization. Only then will we be able to imagine appropriate responses and solutions.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: P. Gill
Expected enrollment: 16

POLIT-100-04 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: How Words Change Worlds: Writers, Politics, and Power
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)
Jean Paul Sartre tells us words are like "loaded pistols." They have the power to transform worlds and inspire revolutions. Focusing on the power of language and the ideas they carry, we will look at writers as agents of social and political change. How do governments and society react to their work (censors, the media, readers?) We have two goals: to examine the interaction between aesthetics and politics, and the relationship between writers and governments. We will include some of the "greats" such as Rousseau, Swift, Orwell, Sartre, Andrei Platonov, Solzhenitsyn, Rushdie and Chinua Achebe.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: S. Jones
Expected enrollment: 19

POLIT-100-05 - Politics - 2015-2016

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar
"Black Metropolis" refers to the more than half a million black people jammed into a South Side ghetto in Chicago at mid-twentieth century that featured an entrenched black political machine, a prosperous black middle class, and a thriving black cultural scene in the midst of massive poverty and systemic inequality. This course will follow the political, economic, and cultural developments of what scholars considered to be the typical urban community in postwar United States. We will examine such topics as Martin Luther King's failed desegregation campaign; Harold Washington, first black mayor; William Julius Wilson's urban underclass thesis; and the rise of Barack Obama.

(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Confessions, Novels, and Notebooks: The Self and Political Thought - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 100f(01))

What is the relationship between personal experience and political thought? How do political thinkers grasp and convey the connections between self and political order? Our first-year seminar will probe the links between heart and mind in political philosophy by exploring the lives and writings of illustrative figures who together span the history of political thought. Texts will include memoirs and fiction as well as abstract theoretical works.

Fall Comparative Politics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

This course provides an introduction to comparative political analysis, one of the four subfields of political science. The primary objective is to help students understand how the "modern" world, one characterized by the rise of industrialized nation-states, took form and what shape it might take in the post-Cold War era. We will examine how the challenges of economic development, social transformation, and nation-building sparked the emergence of alternatives to "modernity" characterized by diverse configurations of political institutions and social forces. We will also assess how globalization and the re-emergence of local identities may be redefining our understanding of "modernity."

(Fall) Ancient and Medieval Political Thought - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Through the works of the ancient tragedians and comedians, Thucydides, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Seneca, Augustine, Aquinas, and Pizan, this course explores themes in ancient and medieval political thought. In alternating years, the course will be taught as either a survey of a wide array of authors or as a more thematically focused study of just a few writers. In either format, we will pay particular attention to the ways these writers characterized the relationship between the individual and community; the roles knowledge, reason, emotion, and rhetoric play in political life; the link between gender and citizenship; and the various forms political community can take.

(Spring) Oil and Water Don't Mix: Geopolitics, Energy, and the Environment - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 242)
Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

(Fall) Gender and Power in Global Contexts: The Politics of Abortion in the Americas - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
The Americas have been characterized by the strictness of their laws in the criminalization of abortion. In some countries abortion is criminalized even when the woman's life is at risk. What role have women's movements played in advancing abortion rights? What has mattered most for a movement's success, its internal characteristics or external forces? Has the way the movement framed its demands mattered? How has the political influence of the Catholic and Evangelical churches influenced policies in this area? We will answer these questions by exploring examples from across the region through primary and secondary sources.

Gentrification, unemployment, crime, failing schools, disinvestment, mass incarceration--what comes to mind when you think of the inner city? In response to a constrained fiscal environment, cities have increasingly adopted neoliberal policy approaches to address seemingly intractable urban problems. The seminar will study current research to assess the political and economic impact of this neoliberal policy regime on housing, education, and public safety.
Prerequisites: Politics 100, a politics First-Year Seminar, or Africana Studies 200.
Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?

Prerequisites: 8 credits in Politics, International Relations, Russian and Eurasian Studies, or History

Instructors: B. Forjwuor
Expected enrollment: 18

The seminar will draw upon Foucauldian analytics of governmentality, to engage the concept of race/racism as founded on, and maintained by, colonial material conditions mobilized for political outcomes. In exposing race as constituted by a colonial and governmental lineage rather than a biological or ethnic ancestry of origins, the course shifts the conceptual meaning of race/racism from its contemporary anchorage in ideology and biology, to the constitutive logics of colonial practices of governmentality in contemporary western liberal democracies. The seminar maps ways race/racism can be accounted for as necessary political tools routinely employed by states' for administrative control.

The silk roads were ancient transportation and trade links that wound their way across the Eurasian continent, or by sea through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean, to Europe. They carried silk, glass, jade, and moved religions and literatures across continents. Today, the new silk roads carry oil, gas, drugs, capitalism, and immigrants seeking better lives. We will investigate the parallels between the ancient and modern silk roads and the contemporary strategic, cultural, and economic significance of these new highways, which link China, Central Asia, the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe.

(Russian and Eurasian Studies 316FR)
The enlargement of the European Union (EU) to Central and Eastern European countries has generated new neighbors to the east and south - the Western Newly Independent States (WNIS) of Russia, Belarus, Moldova, and Ukraine, and Southern Mediterranean countries (SMCs) Egypt, Libya, and Tunisia. Europe's new neighbors make up 410 million inhabitants, but their GDP capita is barely one tenth of the European Union's. This has brought problems for the EU, including migration pressures, human trafficking, and refugees. How is the EU dealing with these issues and how will relations with the new neighbors affect the domestic and foreign policies of the EU?

(Fall) Politics of Decolonization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Africana Studies 321)
This seminar is a critical exploration of the various processes, accounts and theories of colonialism and decolonization in Africa and the Americas. The aim is to chart alternative paths to rethinking the meaning and impact of these terms. Focusing on the various colonial/imperial tools employed to subjugate, exploit and dominate colonized subjects, we will examine how liberal discourses/structures that are assumed to embody the terms of freedom and sovereignty have now become extensions of the colonial they were initially employed to overcome. The main objective of this course is to explore various approaches to redefining decolonization, noting the changing meaning of colonialism.

(Spring) Justice: Theory and Practice - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Write-intensive)
This course explores various theories of justice, examining the most dominant approaches to the subject within modern and contemporary political theory, as well as the relation of justice to democracy and questions of identity, recognition, and inclusion. The course will also focus on the implications of those theories for political, social, and economic institutions by offering students a problem-based learning environment in which they will work together to bring theoretical insights to bear on actual political problems.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in the department or permission of instructor

Instructors: E. Markovits

POLIT-359-01 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Democratization and Civil Society in East Asia
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the dramatic emergence of democratic institutions and civil society in East Asia. The primary aim of the class is to help students understand and analyze the process of democratic unfolding in Japan, Korea, and Taiwan. We will also evaluate China’s recent, albeit limited experiments with democratic practices. We will begin by contrasting Western perspectives of democracy with both traditional and more contemporary Asian understandings of democracy. We will then focus on the actual processes of democratic consolidation in each of the cases, especially the developments that precipitated political crisis and ultimately, political change.

Prerequisites: jr. sr.

Instructors: C. Chen

POLIT-361-01 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Politics and Rhetoric - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Write-intensive)
People have long accused politicians of using rhetoric to pander to audiences and get what they want regardless of the truth. But democratic politics depends on communication to persuade and motivate others. In this course, we will analyze classical writings on rhetoric, contemporary democratic political theory, and hear from professionals in order to probe the relationship between rhetoric and politics. Students will also engage in an extended campaign simulation, in which they devise, implement, and react to campaign rhetorical strategies. Prior work in political theory is required and prior work in American Politics is strongly recommended.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, or permission of instructor. 8 credits in politics, including at least one theory course required

Instructors: E. Markovits

POLIT-366-01 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Fall) International Migration
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines migration and transnational processes from a comparative perspective. It focuses on the relationship between globalization and international migration, with special attention to transnational networks and diaspora politics. We will explore major theories, forms, and patterns of migration in global politics; the involvement of diaspora organizations in the politics of host and home states; and the implications of migration and refugee flows for state sovereignty, national identity, and citizenship. We will conclude by analyzing the key debates and framing of immigration policies and models of citizenship in Europe and the United States.

(Spring) Decision Making - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
On decision making, and the pathologies of decision making, in American politics. When, and to what extent, can we say that a particular policy decision is the result of rational choice, institutional processes, pluralistic pressures, or other forces? When are individual or collective decisions likely to be marred by "groupthink," selective attention, or self-deception? To what extent, if at all, may collective decisions be considered rational or moral? When are challenges to authority, or to dominant opinion, likely to make a difference?

(Spring) Black Radicalism - *Not offered this year/term
(Writing-intensive; Africana Studies 369)
The struggles and ideas of transatlantic black radicals have changed the ways we think and study -- through the formation of Africana/African-American/Black Studies -- and the ways in which we express thoughts and ideas -- through culture and politics. In this seminar, we will study the interdisciplinary history of black radicalism in the 20th century in the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa. This interdisciplinary history is animated by a central debate over the role of black internationalism, if any, in domestic black radical thought and action in the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa.
Prerequisites: Africana Studies 200 or permission of instructor
Notes: There will be a number of shared classes/discussions with the Africana Studies Senior Seminar at Williams College, both in person and through video-conference, who will be sharing the same syllabus. We will make a class visit to Williams, and we will host a visit from the Williams seminar. The shared meetings will be organized around speakers, presentations, and local activists.

(Spring) The Politics of Transformation in China and India
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This seminar provides a structured comparison of two "emerging giants," China and India. Interdisciplinary in scope, the class draws upon various approaches and frameworks to analyze the economic, social, and political development of the two countries. Topics include the impact of market-based reforms and migration, demands for representation and increased political participation, nationalism, environmental degradation, and human capital. We will conclude with a focus on China-India relations and their aspirations for great power status in Asia and beyond. Students will develop and refine "real world" skill sets through the writing of policy memos, simulations, and formal presentations.

(Fall) Pivotal Political Ideas: Capitalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Critical Social Thought 391CT)
After reviewing the classic defense of capitalism as an engine of freedom, progress, and productivity, we will examine major shifts in the critique of capitalism from the early 19th to the early 21st century. This critical conceptual history will range over successive claims that capitalism foments labor exploitation and class inequality, imperialism, instrumentalism, the commodification of culture, the privatization of the commons, and the re-making of subjectivities to suit market imperatives. The course will conclude with Pope Francis's charge that the global capitalist system endangers "whatever is fragile, like the environment" and devours everything "in the way of increased profits." Is Francis right, and if so, what are possible cures for these ills?

POLIT-391-05 - Politics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Pivotal Political Ideas: Capitalism II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
The gains of global capitalism since the 2009 Great Recession and the laws and institutions organized to sustain the market have been breathtaking. What explains how and why citizens around the world have been unwilling or unable to imagine an alternative to free market competition? If citizens are genuinely committed to capitalism, why? During the first part of the course, we will consider these questions and the heightened fear that the triumph of the economy means the end of politics, at least in its democratic form. The second half of the course will conclude by examining the possibilities for post-capitalist politics, economic democracy, and alter-capitalism. Readings will include works by Hayek, Arendt, Lauren Berlant, Gar Alpertovitz, and JK Gibson-Graham.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course is conducted as a hands-on research workshop. Students will work collaboratively on one major social psychological research project during the semester, seeing it through from a literature review to a final research report. The projects are chosen by students (with input from the professor), and often have an emphasis on emotions and/or social behavior. Projects must be feasible to complete within the term and use quantitative methods. The course content will provide support for the research process, including topics like social psychology methodology, statistical analysis, and formal APA-style writing.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200
Instructors: L. Dickens
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-319-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar in Social Psychology: Emotions
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
What are emotions, and how should we think about them? How are our emotional experiences related to our actions within the social realm? This course will attempt to address these questions and investigate the functionality of emotions in our relationships and in our lives more generally. We'll cover classic and contemporary emotion theories and consider recent work addressing the usefulness of emotions like gratitude, disgust, pride, jealousy, happiness, and anger.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200
Instructors: L. Dickens
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-323-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Laboratory in Qualitative Research
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This course offers a hands-on introduction to methods of psychological research that focus on the qualitative description and analysis of human experience. Students learn a variety of techniques of data collection (interviewing, intensive observation, archival research) and methods of analyzing textual sources -- from historical accounts to blogs, memoirs, observational narratives, and interview transcripts. Readings focus on specific methodological practices as well as on the history and philosophy of science differentiating qualitative methods from other approaches to psychological research. Students work both collaboratively and individually on projects throughout the course.
Prerequisites: Per I. Students must complete an application form (available in the Psychology Department Office) and turn it in to the Psychology Department Office by noon on Monday, November 16.
Instructors: G. Hornstein
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-326-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Laboratory in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Mental Health Outcomes Research - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course)
This course examines health data and outcomes. The course will focus on quantitative analysis of health (mental and physical) indicators and outcomes. As part of the class, students will be introduced to concepts and techniques of clinical interviewing and clinical case studies. Students will interact with researchers and practitioners from the community. The course will also emphasize research, clinical, and professional ethics. Students will be exposed to different clinical instrumentation, the role of data in clinical interventions, in assessments, and in research on treatment effectiveness.
Prerequisites: Jr. sr., Psych 200, 201 and one course in abnormal psychology
Instructors: A. Douglas
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-329-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Positive Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the emerging field of Positive Psychology which uses science to understand and enhance positive aspects of the human experience (i.e., "the good life"). Positive Psychology stands in contrast to more traditional psychological approaches that focus on pathology. We will critically examine theory and research in Positive Psychology, including strengths and virtues, meaning in life, positive coping, authenticity, happiness, gratitude, flow, religion/spirituality, and optimism. We will also explore applications and interventions informed by positive psychology in domains personally relevant to students' lives such as school, work, and close relationships.
Prerequisites: 100 level psychology course; Psychology 200; jr or sr; a course in personality, abnormal, or social preferred.
Instructors: W. Davis
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-329-02 - Psychology - 2015-2016

(Fall) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Psychology of Trauma

(Gender Studies 333DP)

What happens after a traumatic event? Why do some people develop psychological disorders and others do not? This course will explore the psychological theories and research on trauma and stress. Topics covered will include childhood abuse, domestic violence, combat violence, community violence, and interpersonal violence. The seminar will explore psychological dysfunction, disorders, as well as adaptation and coping following exposure to traumatic stress. In addition, the course will explore the concept of "cultural trauma."

Prerequisites: 100 level psychology course; Psychology 200; jr or sr. A course in abnormal psychology preferred

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-330-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016

(Spring) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Cultural Development of Morality

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

We will explore the development of children's moral reasoning about helping and caring for others. Our goal is to understand social processes of development by examining how children engage with cultural messages about helping. Students will work on one of three projects, which will likely involve children's conversations about helping with parents, and with peers, and naturalistic classroom observations among elementary-school-aged children. In small groups, students will formulate a hypothesis, create materials and measures, collect and analyze data, and write a research report. Throughout we will engage with theoretical and methodological literature targeted to these areas of inquiry.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and 230 or 233

Instructors: A. DiBianca Fasoli

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-330-02 - Psychology - 2015-2016

(Fall) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Academic Identity Development

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

In this lab course, students will focus on the development of academic identity and self-efficacy in college students. In particular, students will learn more about how students make sense of and integrate feedback on their academic progress by engaging in an action research project involving the practice of academic peer coaching. In addition, students will learn about interviewing methods and program assessment. Central to our discussions and analyses will be issues of race, class, gender, and age. Students interested in education, mentoring, or nonprofits will especially benefit.

Prerequisites: Psychology 201 and 200.

Instructors: B. Packard, M. Babineau

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-331-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016

(Fall) Lab in Early Social and Personality Development

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

In the role of a participant-observer, each student studies intensively the social and personality development of the children in one classroom at the Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook. Students learn how to articulate developmental changes and individual differences by analyzing detailed observations. Topics include social cognition, peer relationships, social skills, concepts of friendship, emotional development, identity formation, self-esteem, and the social and cultural context of development.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and 230 or permission of instructor

Notes: 2 labs (3 hours each) required at Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook

Instructors: A. Grillo

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-337-01  -  Psychology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar in Educational Psychology: Self-Directed Learning
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

Are children "wired" to be able to learn without direct instruction? Does the process of schooling diminish or enhance our capacity to be self-directed learners? What factors determine one's readiness for self-directed learning, and can self-directed learning be "taught?" What role, if any, do teachers play in self-directed learning? This seminar explores these questions in the context of an ongoing ethnographic study of an alternative education program within a public high school. Participants will have a chance to engage with data from that study and practice qualitative research skills through site visits to schools that encourage self-directed learning.

Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Preference given to students who have taken Educational Psychology and have some familiarity with qualitative research.

Notes: Interested students should email Professor Grillo during advising week to explain why they want to take this seminar.

Instructors: A. Grillo

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-339-01  -  Psychology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar in Developmental Psychology: Language and Literacy Development in Early Childhood
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

This course explores how home and school learning environments influence the development of language and literacy skills of children ages 3-8 and examines situations in which families and schools, although utilizing different languages, dialects, and ways of communicating, can work together to enhance children's language learning. Particular attention is given to children's development of academic language -- the written and spoken language needed to understand and create texts required for success in school.

Prerequisites: Prior coursework in developmental psychology, educational psychology, or cognitive psychology required.

Instructors: J. Jacoby

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-339-02  -  Psychology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar in Developmental Psychology: Culture and Child Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

In this course we will examine the cultural contexts and processes of child development. To that end, our course will be organized by several core questions: How does our biological heritage prepare us to learn from others and to use cultural artifacts? What is childhood like among people's across the world? What are the routine child-rearing practices, child activities, and children's relationships? How are the sequences and endpoints of development culturally shaped, for example, in domains such as emotions, self, morality, memory, and reasoning? Our central goal will be to understand how children develop in and through their participation in cultural communities.

Prerequisites: Psych 100, jr or sr, and Psych 230 or Psych 233

Instructors: A. DiBianca Fasoli

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-340-01  -  Psychology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Laboratory in Perception and Cognition: Cognition and Literacy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Community-based learning course)

Adult illiteracy in the U.S. presents an ever-growing challenge. To understand this problem, we will learn various theories of reading. However, since many models of reading are based on data gathered from children, we will also examine how the cognitive abilities of adults are different from those of children. A large component of this class concerns learning the lab techniques associated with assessing reading abilities. In addition, since this is a community-based learning course, each student will become a tutor for an adult enrolled in an area literacy program.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology, 201, 200, and Per I. Students must email Prof. Binder during advising week to get permission to register.

Notes: 3 hours per week as a literacy tutor in Springfield is required.

Instructors: K. Binder

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-340-01  -  Psychology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Laboratory in Perception and Cognition: Human Electrophysiology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course surveys the theory and practice of using recordings of electrical activity of the brain to study aspects of human cognition. Lectures will describe how event-related brain potentials (ERPs) have been used to address issues related to language, memory, attention, and perception, and students will gain experience critically reading and evaluating research reports in this area. Students will also learn how to collect, process, statistically analyze, and interpret ERP data through the completion of group research projects.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200. A cognitive psychology course preferred.

Instructors: M. Breen

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-349-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016

(Fall) Seminar in Perception and Cognition: Topic to be announced

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

In this seminar students will take an in-depth look at one hot topic in Cognitive Psychology. Weekly assignments will include readings from the primary literature, class presentations and discussion, and papers.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and 201.

Instructors: K. Binder

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-350-01 - Psychology - 2015-2016

(Fall) Laboratory in Behavioral Neuroscience

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

This intensive laboratory course will train students to use the technical methods and tools commonly used in behavioral neuroscience research. Skills covered will include animal care and handling, use of behavioral assays, pharmacology, and neurosurgical procedures. Students will engage in weekly exercises and hands-on experiments to study the link between brain function and behavioral responses. These preclinical tools will be used to test research questions related to learning and memory, social-emotional responses, and drug-seeking behaviors. After completion of this course, students will have a deeper understanding of the design and implementation of behavioral neuroscience research.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200; Psychology 250 or Neuroscience 100; and permission of instructor

Notes: Interested students must meet with the instructor before or during the advising week to obtain additional information about the course.

Instructors: J. Schwartzer

Expected enrollment: 12

(Fall) Seminar in Biological Bases of Behavior: Madness and Molecules

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

Charpentier, a French scientist of the 1940s, unwittingly discovered a chemical that was to alter dramatically our understanding of madness. The chemical, chlorpromazine, has been widely used for the treatment of psychosis. Of interest is neuropsychopharmacology—the science and the technology. The principles of pharmacology are discussed and precede the examination of applications of the technology to psychopathology (for example, schizophrenia, depression, anxiety, and violent behavior).

Prerequisites: Neuroscience 100 or Psychology 100 AND Psychology 201 or Statistics 240

Instructors: W. Millard

Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) Seminar: Biological Bases of Behavior: Clinical Neuroscience

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

Explore how psychology, neuroscience, and medicine come together to study the etiology and treatment of neuropsychiatric disorders. Students will examine the behavioral features and neurobiology behind various clinical disorders such as Autism, ADHD, Substance Use Disorders, Mood Disorders, Schizophrenia, Anxiety, and Neurodegenerative Diseases. The course will rely on primary research to identify how changes in physiology and biology might manifest in the behaviors that define psychopathology. Students will gain a deeper understanding of clinical and preclinical techniques used to study these disorders while bridging their knowledge of molecular, cellular, and systems neuroscience research.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200; Neuro 100 strongly recommended, or Per I

Instructors: J. Schwartzer

(Fall) Racism and Inequality in Schools and Society
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Writing-intensive; Psychology 215)
What is race? Who decides? Are we a "postracial" society? This course examines the historical, social, and legal underpinnings of the social construction of race and how perspectives on race have influenced lives within school communities. Classes compare old vs. "new" racism, contrast the workings of white privilege with calls for white responsibility, explore perspectives on the "achievement" and "opportunity" gaps, and examine impact of antiracist pedagogies on inequities in education at the curricular, interpersonal, and institutional levels. Intersectionality of race and other identities will also be addressed. Essays, response papers, field experiences, and final project are required.

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr or permission of instructor
Notes: Prepracticum required

(Fall) Observing and Assisting in Inclusive Classrooms
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Students are expected to complete a supervised field experience full-time every day during January Intersession in an inclusive classroom in a school setting. Placements can be located within or outside of the Five College area. In addition to the field experience component, students attend three course meetings (detailed below). Reading and writing assignments focus on a survey of learning disabilities, descriptions of special education programs, understanding Individuals with Disabilities Education Act policies and placement options, interpreting Individualized Education Program plans, and planning curriculum for inclusive classrooms.
Prerequisites: Prereq. One of the following: Psychology 230, 233, Education 205, Educ Studies 215 or permission of instructor. Three mandatory meetings (2 hours each): two in November and one in Feb. Prepracticum: five days a week for three weeks in January.
Notes: Permission to participate in prepracticum experience for credit is contingent upon attendance at the meetings in November. Consult Ms.Frenette in Oct for exact dates of the Nov course meetings. This course is required of all students pursuing teacher licensure. Graded on a credit/no credit basis

(Spring) Practicum Seminar on Teaching and Learning: Early Childhood and Elementary Education
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This weekly seminar provides students with opportunities to examine curriculum development models, develop an integrated curriculum unit utilizing state and national content area standards, review researched based models of classroom management, and engage in dialogue with practicing teachers regarding numerous aspects of teaching and student learning. Additional topics covered include the arts in education, physical education, legal obligations of teachers, and home-school communication. As is the case in all pre-licensure programs, there is continued emphasis on addressing the needs of students with disabilities and English Language Learners.

(Spring) Student Teaching in Early Childhood and Elementary Schools
Credits/PE Units: 10; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Students participate in full-time student teaching in early childhood and elementary classrooms for 12 weeks. During this semester-long field-based placement, students hone classroom management skills, implement an extended integrated curriculum unit, deliver lessons in all content areas, and develop a wide range of assessment skills. The practicum culminates in two weeks of Lead Teaching, during which the student is responsible for managing all aspects of the classroom program. Students work with classroom teachers and college supervisors to address Professional Teaching Standards as required by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts’ Pre-service Performance Assessment Program.
Prerequisites: Sr, Education 300, 325 and 320j, and permission of instructor
Notes: 5 days a week for 12 weeks full-time student teaching in school site (includes Mount Holyoke College's spring break); limited to students accepted to the practicum year program. This course is graded on a credit/no credit basis.

Students will learn about inquiry-based science/math curriculum and use of technology in PreK-6 classroom. They will construct more extensive understandings of science/math instruction by developing lessons that implement the Massachusetts Frameworks incorporating the Common Core State Standards for Mathematics. They will teach a minimum of three lessons to students in their pre-practicum setting. Emphasis will be on learning diverse management and instructional practices, such as the use of manipulatives, problem solving, cooperative learning, and project-based learning. Students will also become more adept at developing effective approaches to using assessment to guide instruction.

Prerequisites: Limited to students accepted in the practicum year program

Notes: Pre-practicum required

Instructors: M. Flynn

(Fall) Religious Movements in America - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
What is American religion? Is America a "Christian" nation? How has immigration affected the American religious landscape? How have struggles for freedom, civil rights, racial, economic, gender, and LGBTQ equality affected what people believe and how they act out these beliefs? To begin to answer these questions, we survey the main historical narratives of religion in the U.S. from the colonial period to the present. We also zero in at various moments in this history to appreciate the variety of religion and religious experience in American life. This combination enables us to engage the tension between the two main ways of considering religion in America: the quest for religious consensus and the recognition of a thoroughly pluralistic American religious culture.

(Spring) Religion and Politics in Modern India - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; History 223)
The history of India has been singled out for its complex intermingling of religion and politics. This course will explore the constitution of religious identities in two of India's largest religious communities: Hindu and Muslim. Focusing primarily on the colonial period, we will discuss religious reform movements, communal violence, mass politics, and the partition of the subcontinent into the independent states of India and Pakistan. Throughout we will be interested in the ways that the colonial experience affected the religious thought and practice of Indians. Finally, we will explore the meanings of this history for the postcolonial workings of democracy and secularism in modern India.

(Spring) Topics in Religion: Gender and Sexuality in South Asian Religion
(Gender Studies 210SA)
From the erotic asceticism of the god Siva to the spiritual power of an auspicious married woman, the nexus of gender and sexuality has broadly shaped the practices and philosophies of South Asia's many religious traditions. The central questions guiding this course are: How do Buddhism, Hinduism, and Islam incorporate sexual practice and/or restraint into a vision of ethical life? When does one's sexuality or gender become dangerous or unethical? In pursuing these questions, students will gain a deep familiarity with South Asian asceticism, the place of erotics within religious discourse, new perspectives on queer and transgender theories, emic feminisms, and sexual ethics.

(Spring) What Didn't Make It in the New Testament - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Hundreds of ancient Christian texts did not make it into the New Testament. "What Didn't Make It in the New Testament” examines some of these excluded writings. We will explore Gnostic gospels, hear of a five-year-old Jesus killing (and later resurrecting) his classmates, peruse ancient Christian romance novels, tour heaven and hell, read the garden of Eden story told from the perspective of the snake, and learn how the world will end. In critically examining these ancient narratives, we will better appreciate the diversity of formative Christianity, better understand the historical context of the early church, and explore the politics behind what did and did not make it into the bible.

(Spring) Encounters Between Judaism and Other Religious Traditions: Christianity, Islam, and Buddhism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Jewish Studies 249)
This course will explore selected examples of the encounter between Judaism and other world religious traditions. Living alongside other religious traditions over millennia, how have Jewish religious thought and practice creatively appropriated, adapted, as well as resisted aspects of "foreign" religions. Examples we will consider include encounters with medieval Islam in the realms of Arabic poetry and Sufi mysticism, Christianity in connection with religious ritual, mystical notions of the divine feminine, and in our own time, the influence of Buddhism on American Judaism.
RELIG-252-01 - Religion - 2015-2016
(Fall) Magic, Prayer, and Sacrifice: Rituals and Why We Do Them
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
From live sacrifice to sacred dances, from pilgrimage to bodily purification, rituals have long been considered a hallmark of religion. Yet, ritual activities are also important to apparently non-religious spheres of life, such as sporting events and political mobilization. This course will examine examples of ritual activity from a range of cultural contexts through the lens of anthropological, sociological, psychological, and religious studies theories of ritual. We will explore the structure of ritual activities, the question of whether rituals have meaning and function for individuals and for societies, and, if so, what those meanings and functions might be.

(Fall) What Didn't Make It in the Bible
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Jewish Studies 256)
Hundreds of ancient religious texts did not make it into the Hebrew Scripture (aka the Old Testament). This course examines some of these excluded writings. In particular, we will focus on works found among the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, and the Dead Sea Scrolls. We will read an ancient Harlequin romance, tour heaven and hell, hear of the adventures of fallen angels who sired giants (and taught humans about cosmetics), and learn how the world will end. In critically examining such texts, we will better appreciate the diversity of Judaism, better understand the historical context of early Christianity, and explore the politics behind what did and did not make it into the bible.

(Spring) Sufism: The Mystic Path in Islam - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
Exploration of the mystical tradition in Islam known as Sufism, from its origins in medieval Iraq to its role in contemporary Islamic societies. This course focuses on how the Sufi pursuit of unity with, or annihilation in, God relates to the core monotheistic beliefs of Islam. Sufi theories and practices are studied through primary source materials. Special attention will be paid to the themes of love, desire, and beauty in the literature of Sufism.
Notes: This course counts towards the Asian Studies, Middle Eastern Studies, and South Asian Studies majors and minors.
Instructors: A. Steinfels

(Fall) Topics in Contemporary Theology: Feminist Theologies - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement (Gender Studies 333FF)
Mary Daly, Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza, Phyllis Trible, and Judith Plaskow, among others, have argued that traditional Jewish and Christian theological systems have overlooked the needs, concerns, histories, and contributions of women. Their challenges range from the historical modification of a presumably unbiased religious system to the outright rejection of a so-called patriarchal establishment. Whatever their approach, feminist theologies offer diverse and incisive tools for understanding how a theological system operates, how transitory cultural assumptions become embedded in ongoing doctrines, and how apparently minor adjustments can have significant ripple effects.

RELIG-332-01 - Religion - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar in American Religious History: The Shakers - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement (Gender Studies 333PP)
Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers advanced students an opportunity to investigate with some sophistication a problem that requires careful attention to research methods, to critical literature, and to writing. Seminar topics include people, periods, or problems that have a particular bearing on religion in America.

This course will examine the historical and cultural creation of the Shaker society. The religious vision of an alternative society whose birth and development paralleled that of the new American nation; by contrast and by imitation, the separate Shaker route thus offers an intriguing critique of American society and its values, and an unusual laboratory for examining a religious community based on a dual godhead.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in Religion, or 8 credits in Gender Studies, or Permission of Instructor.

Instructors: J. Crosthwaite

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English; Spanish 360MT, Italian 361MT, French 321MT)
Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.
Travel literature has always been a precious source for the study of culture, politics, arts and, last but not least, people. From Tacitus to Marco Polo, from Stendhal to Camilo Jose Cela, we will read and discuss authors who traveled for political, personal, and recreational reasons. We will also pay special attention to tales of emigration and immigration in the third millennium.
Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit.

RES-210-01 - Russian and Eurasian Studies - 2015-2016
(Fall) Great Books: The Literature of Nineteenth-Century Russia
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
In no other culture has literature occupied the central role it enjoyed in nineteenth-century Russia. Political, social, and historical constraints propelled Russian writers into the roles of witness, prophet, and sage. Yet, far from being limited to the vast, dark "Big Question" novels of legend, Russian literature offers much humor, lyricism, and fantasy. We will focus on the Russian novel as a reaction to western European forms of narrative and consider the recurring pattern of the strong heroine and the weak hero. Authors will include: Pushkin, Lermontov, Gogol, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Chekhov.
Instructors: P. Scotto

(Spring) Dostoevsky and the Problem of Evil: The Brothers Karamazov - *Not offered this year/term
Perhaps no other novelist has delved as deeply into the psychological and metaphysical dimensions of evil as the Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoevsky. This course will be devoted to a close reading of Dostoevsky's landmark novel of murderous passion and parricide, The Brothers Karamazov. Why should crime and transgression be a privileged avenue of access into the human interior? How is psychology tied to the metaphysical aspect of human existence? What are the sources of evil—and redemption?

Spring Anna Karenina and Contexts: Tolstoy on Love, Death, and Family Life

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)

Anna Karenina (1873) is one of a series of important works Tolstoy wrote pondering love, death, the nature of happiness, and the foundations of family life. Our reading of Anna Karenina will be the centerpiece of this course which will also include works ranging from Childhood (1852) to The Kreutzer Sonata (1889), which shocked and repelled readers with its unsparing depictions of human sexuality and murderous jealousy. Film versions of works will be screened.

Fall Contemporary Russian Politics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Politics 209)

Russia was transformed by communist revolution into a global superpower that challenged the dominant ideologies of liberalism and nationalism. It became a powerful alternative to capitalism. In 1991, this imperial state collapsed and underwent an economic, political, and cultural revolution. What explains the Soviet Union's success for 70 years and its demise in 1991? What sort of country is Russia as it enters the twenty-first century? Is it a democracy? How has Russia's transformation affected ordinary people and Russia's relationship to the West?

Spring Russia and the West

(Taught in English; Politics 264)

Since its creation at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Soviet Union dominated the minds of Western foreign policymakers. None of the West's policies in the Middle East, the Third World, Europe, or China after World War II can be understood without the study of Soviet foreign policy. We will examine the development of Soviet foreign policy since 1917 and, following the collapse of the USSR in 1991, the role played by Russia and Russia and the former Soviet republics in the far more complex and multipolar "New World Order." What should U.S. policy be toward the emerging new states of the Baltics, Central Asia, and Caucasus?

Spring Oil and Water Don't Mix: Geopolitics, Energy, and the Environment - Not offered this year/term

(Taught in English; Politics 242)

Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

RES-251-01 - Russian and Eurasian Studies - 2015-2016

Spring Advanced Russian

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement; does not meet a distribution requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): We will study a variety of texts and set them into the cultural context that marks them as distinctly Russian. Texts will be selected from a broad range of genres and sources. Readings, discussions, short oral and written reports. Special attention to complex grammatical constructions and vocabulary building. Taught in Russian.
This course aims at expansion of students' vocabulary and improvement of both writing and speaking skills. The course is intended for students who have completed at least four semesters of Russian or the equivalent. Heritage learners of Russian (those who speak the language) will also benefit from the course. With a strong emphasis on integrating vocabulary in context, this course aims to help students advance their lexicon and grammar, increase fluency, and overcome speaking inhibitions. We will read and discuss a variety of texts including short stories, films, and articles.

(Spring) Silk Roads: Ancient and Modern Highways across the Eurasian Continent - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Politics 312)
The silk roads were ancient transportation and trade links that wound their way across the Eurasian continent, or by sea through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean, to Europe. They carried silk, glass, jade, and moved religions and literatures across continents. Today, the new silk roads carry oil, gas, drugs, capitalism, and immigrants seeking better lives. We will investigate the parallels between the ancient and modern silk roads and the contemporary strategic, cultural, and economic significance of these new highways, which link China, Central Asia, the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe.

(Spring) The New Democracies - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 300f)
With the collapse of the USSR we were told that history was dead and liberal democracy triumphant. There was a "third wave" of democratic change. How accurate have these optimistic characterizations turned out to be? After an introduction to theories of liberal democracy and to the new discipline of "transitology" we will look at how states and leaders have applied such liberal-democratic ideas in Eastern Europe and the former USSR (with comparative examples from Africa and South America), and with what success.

(Spring) European Studies Seminar: Foreigners Within, Foreigners Without: The EU and its New Neighbors - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
The enlargement of the European Union (EU) to Central and Eastern European countries has generated new neighbors to the east and south - the Western Newly Independent States (WNIS) of Russia, Belarus, Moldova, and Ukraine, and Southern Mediterranean countries (SMCs) Egypt, Libya, and Tunisia. Europe's new neighbors make up 410 million inhabitants, but their GDP capita is barely one tenth of the European Union's. This has brought problems for the EU, including migration pressures, human trafficking, and refugees. How is the EU dealing with these issues and how will relations with the new neighbors affect the domestic and foreign policies of the EU?

(Fall) Nationalism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 308)
Preamble (for topics courses): Courses in this section satisfy the distribution requirement in social sciences.
Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?

(Spring) Revolutions
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Politics 350)
By the 1980s, after the failure of Marxist revolutions, scholars and politicians declared that "history" and with it, the age of revolution was over. From now on, they said, all states will move toward the model of market capitalism. But the last decade of the 20th century and the first fifteen years of the 21st century have shown that history, and with it, revolution, is far from over. We will look at the American and Russian revolutions, at Nazism, the Iranian revolution of 1979, Eastern Europe in 1989, the 'colored revolutions,' and the Arab Spring. Revolutions are still with us, and we will study why.

(Spring) Race in America: Let's Talk
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
From the Black Lives Matter movement to debates about immigration and a color-blind America, race and ethnicity are at the forefront of contemporary public discourse. In this course students will be introduced to the various sociological perspectives and theoretical frameworks used to understand racial and ethnic relations in the United States. Racial and ethnic identities remain an important aspect of how people view themselves and others. In this course, we will discuss the dynamics of individual racial and ethnic groups including African Americans, Latino Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, and White Americans. We will also examine what the concepts of race and ethnicity mean and how they affect various aspects of American society.

(Fall) Survey Research and Data Analysis
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is an introduction to the use of quantitative data in sociology. It focuses on the ways in which data is collected, analyzed, and presented to make sociological arguments. Students will be asked to analyze data for both regular assignments and a final paper. The aim of the course is to show how to understand the uses of different types of survey data, and to create and analyze simple statistics and multivariate statistical models using statistical software.
Prerequisites: sociology majors or permission of instructor
Instructors: T. Malacarne
Expected enrollment: 30

SOCI-231-01 - Sociology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Criminology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course focuses on the historical and theoretical development of the major approaches to crime and criminality. Criminology began in the second half of the nineteenth century when its pioneers asked the "big questions" pertaining to crime, society, and human nature. As criminology progressed, it narrowed its focus, concentrating on special areas, such as violent crime and property crime. As sociology began to dominate criminology, new theories were developed to explain the social facts gathered in the last 50 years.

SOCI-316-01 - Sociology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Special Topics in Sociology: Unlawful Convictions in Death Penalty Cases
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
The Death Penalty in America: Unjustly Convicted Death Row Inmates. This course will examine in detail the cases of all 130 death row inmates exonerated in the post-Furman era (1976-2009). It will focus on how the 130 men ended up on death row, as well as the process by which they gained their freedom. In addition, the course will spotlight the many proposals, videotaped police interrogations, eyewitness identifications, forensic science procedures, etc., designed to correct sources of mistakes; and assess their likelihood of successfully preventing both unjust and wrongful convictions in capital cases.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in the department including Sociology 231 or 234 or permission of instructor.

SOCI-316-01 - Sociology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Applied Research Seminar: Campus Wide Web: Internet Usage at Mount Holyoke College
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course takes students through the design, fielding, and reporting of a real social science project. Topically, we will focus on the many ways students use the Internet at Mount Holyoke and how this affects academic, social, and communal outcomes. There will be theoretical and empirical secondary readings, but these will be focused on advancing the hands on project. The majority of the class work will be creating and fielding the social survey, the results of which will ultimately be turned into an academic paper and a professionally-focused analytic report.
Prerequisites: Sociology 225 Data Analysis & Research or permission of instructor
Instructors: T. Malacarne
Expected enrollment: 15

SOCI-316-02 - Sociology - 2015-2016
(Fall) Special Topics in Sociology: Cults, Conspiracies, and Moral Panics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Using case studies such as the Eugenics Movement, Jonestown, and the Kennedy Assassination, this course will examine how distrust of the government, originally motivated by logical concerns, has transformed the way people think about power in the postmodern era. The class will explore the difference between rational questioning of authority and blind distrust that leads to questionable claims. Through topics such as the War on Drugs, this class shows how the powerful are able to use biases and public fears to carry out their own, often counterproductive, measures. These case studies have issues like race and class at their core. We will examine how certain social issues have managed to endure.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in the department and permission of instructor.
SOCI-316-02 - Sociology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Sociology: Sociology of 9/11 and the War on Terror
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
We will explore the cultural and political impact of the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. The media's role in constructing meanings will be a main organizing focus of the course. Using readings, discussions, assignments, and films, the course will allow students to form a picture of how 9/11 changed America and beyond. Course topics include: the way the mainstream media constructed 9/11 and alternate ways they could have; how popular culture and the Public Sphere responded; complex historical factors leading up to 9/11; reasons the attackers say they committed the attacks; ways the event changed culture and politics in the world; conspiracy theories.
Prerequisites: 8 Credits in Sociology or permission of instructor

(Spring) Topics in Sociology: Foodies: Taste and Culture in a Global Society
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
While food offers sustenance for the body, it also plays a fundamental role in shaping social life. This course uses food as a lens to understand identity, inequality, globalization, and other issues central to the contemporary social world. We will explore topics such as how food is used to construct identity, how food reproduces inequality, and how food may contribute to or diminish global boundaries.

SOCI-317-01 - Sociology - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Contemporary Social Thought: Cultural Sociology and Contemporary Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This seminar examines some recent developments in cultural sociology and contemporary social theory. The first part of the class asks: How do we imagine social things? The second part of the class reviews the history of social theory with a focus on the multiple crises of the modernity narrative, and various attempts to resolve these crises. The final third of the class poses the question of how to analyze culture and "do" social theory.
Prerequisites: Some familiarity with social theory is required (for example: Sociology 223 or some substitute), 8 credits in sociology, or permission of instructor
Instructors: E. Townsley
Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) FYS: Breakfast in America
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Have you ever thought about the origins of the sugar, coffee, bananas, and chocolate that we consume at the breakfast table? Who cuts the sugar cane? Who owns the coffee plantation? What are the social and environmental costs of bananas? This interdisciplinary course examines some of the cultural, historical, social, political, and economic issues surrounding these Latin American commodities. We will explore the lives of company owners, laborers, producers, and consumers as we trace the role sugar, coffee, bananas, and chocolate have played in the historical and cultural development of Latin America. We will also how these products are represented in art, literature, and film.

(Spring) Studies in Language and Society: An Introduction: Being Bilingual
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of specific form/meaning relations in the linguistic system of Spanish and the function of language in society. Topics may include, but are not limited to, languages in contact, bilingualism, teaching methodology, translation and interpretation, sociolinguistics, phonetics and phonology, morpho-syntax, semantics and pragmatics. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course will introduce students to key issues and concepts in the study of bilingualism with a focus on communities in which Spanish interacts with other languages in Latin America, Spain, and the United States. One of the main goals of the course is to create awareness about the multidimensional nature of bilingualism as an individual, socio-political, cultural, and a psycholinguistic phenomenon. Topics will include degrees of bilingualism and the notion of "bilingual continua", language acquisition and language processing, relations between language and identity, the linguistic effects of other languages in different Spanish varieties, language maintenance and language loss, language policies and bilingual education.

(Fall) Advanced Studies in Identities and Intersections: Spain and Islam
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): This course will concentrate on the various literary genres and cultural movements that have shaped Latin America from modernismo to the present. Topics will focus on different genres and the expression of diverse ideologies through literature. Since the topic varies each time the course is offered, a student may receive credit more than once.

This course will explore a variety of questions and concerns about the "Islamic constant presence" in Spanish history in order to understand critically the emphatic interest of ISIS in reconquering Spain. From an interdisciplinary perspective employing historical and literary texts, media, legal documents, art, and movies, we will study the Spanish-Islam connection, starting at the period of the supposed coexistence between Muslims and Christians in the Middle Ages. Issues of assimilation and integration in relation to the use of veils, the creation of mosques, immigration, terrorism, and so on, will be analyzed by following a comparative model to examine the past and present.

Prerequisites: Two 200-level courses above 212 or permission of instructor
Instructors: N. Romero-Díaz
Expected enrollment: 16

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: Natural's Not in It: Pedro Almodóvar
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Film Studies 380PA, Gender Studies 333PA)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course studies the films of Pedro Almodóvar, European cinema's favorite bad boy turned acclaimed auteur. On the one hand, students learn to situate films within the context of contemporary Spanish history (the transition to democracy, the advent of globalization, etc.) in order to consider the local contours of postmodern aesthetics. On the other hand, the films provide a springboard to reflect on larger theoretical and ethical debates. For instance, what can a weeping transvestite teach us about desire? What happens when plastic surgery and organ transplants become metaphors? Under what circumstances, if any, can spectators find child prostitution cute?

Prerequisites: Spanish 212

Notes: Weekly evening screenings; taught in English.

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: Surging Cinema: Costa Rica and the Latin American New Waves

(Writing-intensive; Film Studies 370CR)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course studies the emergence of a new kind of cinematography in Costa Rica within the larger context of Latin American cinema's "new waves." First, students will view and discuss several recent Latin American films in order to identify broader trends throughout the region. The focus will then turn to the specifics of a nascent brand of Costa Rican cinema that distinguishes itself from those of other Latin American countries through a unique aesthetic linked to the conditions from which they have emerged. The course will also explore how recent Costa Rican films' stylistic features address issues such as national identity.

(Fall) Advanced Studies in Concepts and Practices of Power: Slanted Subjects: Queer Theories and Literatures in Latin America - *Not offered this year/term

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333XX)

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This class will interrogate the limits and possibilities of talking about a slanted or queer subject position with the context of Latin American literature. Looking at texts from the Caribbean, Central America and South America, we will explore the construction of a queer subjectivity through literature, film and visual art. We will pay careful attention to the intersections of class, race, gender, and sexuality to speak of queerness not only as a sexual orientation, but also as a decolonial intervention. Readings will draw from philosophy as well as literature.

Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

In 1492, the Spanish conquest forever changed indigenous America and created a new world. European imperial discourses collided with resistance movements and the emerging voices of oppressed peoples, including indigenous peoples, women, and mestizos. This course traces the tensions between imperialist and resistance discourses during both the colonial period and today. We will analyze the literary "fighting words" that consolidated the Spanish empire and later opened the path to Latin American independence. Tracing the impact of these struggles on the Americas today, we will examine how subaltern communities currently fight to make their voices heard in a globalized world.

(Spring) Seminar in Romance Languages and Cultures: Topic: The Mind of the Traveler: Journeys, Expeditions, Tours

(Taught in English; Romance Languages & Cultures 375MT, Italian 361MT, French 321MT)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.
Travel literature has always been a precious source for the study of culture, politics, arts and, last but not least, people. From Tacitus to Marco Polo, from Stendhal to Camilo Jose Cela, we will read and discuss authors who traveled for political, personal, and recreational reasons. We will also pay special attention to tales of emigration and immigration in the third millennium.

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit.

Statistics

STAT-140-01 - Statistics - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introduction to the Ideas and Applications of Statistics: Applications in the Sciences and Health
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an overview of statistical methods, their conceptual underpinnings, and their use in various settings taken from current news, as well as from the physical, biological, and social sciences. Topics will include exploring distributions and relationships, planning for data production, sampling distributions, basic ideas of inference (confidence intervals and hypothesis tests), inference for distributions, and inference for relationships, including chi-square methods for two-way tables and regression.
Prerequisites: 2 years of high school algebra
Instructors: A. Kouzehkanani
Expected enrollment: 40

(Fall) Elementary Data Analysis and Experimental Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A fundamental fact of science is that repeated measurements exhibit variability. The course presents ways to design experiments that will reveal systematic patterns while "controlling" the effects of variability and methods for the statistical analysis of data from well-designed experiments. Topics include completely randomized, randomized complete block, Latin Square and factorial designs, and their analysis of variance. The course emphasizes applications, with examples drawn principally from biology, psychology, and medicine.
Prerequisites: Any 100-level mathematics or statistics course or permission of instructor.
Instructors: J. Gifford
Expected enrollment: 40

(Fall) Applied Statistical Modeling and Data Visualization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course introduces statistical modeling and data visualization techniques through in-depth investigation of case studies. Focus is on exploring data, framing hypotheses, selecting appropriate methodologies, implementing analysis, applying diagnostics and interpreting results in the context of the scientific questions. Topics will be selected from descriptive statistics, simple and multiple linear regression, ANOVA and logistic regression.
Prerequisites: Statistics 140 and Mathematics 101, or permission of instructor
Instructors: A. Foulkes

(Spring) Intermediate Statistics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this course, students will learn how to analyze data arising from a broad array of observational and experimental studies. Topics covered will include exploratory graphics, description techniques, the fitting and assessment of statistical models, hypothesis testing, and communication of results. Specific topics may include multiple regression, ANOVA, and non-linear regression. Statistical software will be used.

(Fall) Applied Regression Methods

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This course includes methods for choosing, fitting, evaluating, and comparing statistical models; introduces statistical inference; and analyzes data sets taken from research projects in the natural, physical, and social sciences.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 211 or any statistics course

Instructors: J. Gifford

Expected enrollment: 25

STAT-343-01 - Statistics - 2015-2016
(Spring) Mathematical Statistics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This course is an introduction to the mathematical theory of statistics and to the application of that theory to the real world. Topics include probability, random variables, special distributions, introduction to estimation of parameters, and hypothesis testing.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 102 and Statistics 342

Notes: offered every spring semester alternately at Mount Holyoke and Smith Colleges; offered at Mount Holyoke in spring 2016.

Instructors: A. Foulkes

Expected enrollment: 30

(Spring) Seminar in Statistics and Scientific Research: Survey Sampling Statistics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

In this course, students will explore statistical techniques for designing and analyzing complex survey designs. Sample surveys are used to obtain data on demography, health, and development; to measure attitudes and beliefs; to estimate natural resources; to evaluate the impact of social programs; along with many other uses. The proper design and analysis of these surveys is crucial to their utility. We will cover topics including survey design, ratio estimation, regression estimation, poststratification, imputation, and survey error. We will also make frequent use of real (and often messy) survey data through assignments and projects. Background should include hypothesis testing, regression modeling, and estimation.

Prerequisites: Statistics 340, or permission of instructor

Theatre Arts

THEAT-100-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Introduction to Theatre
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Taught by Department of Theatre Arts faculty and staff, this course offers the student a study and practice of theatre as a collaborative art. Course includes the analysis of the dramatic text in terms of the actor; the director; the scenic, costume, lighting, and sound designers; and technicians. Close analytical readings of play texts and critical/theoretical essays will be supplemented by attending theatre productions both on and off campus and by staging students' own theatrical projects.
Notes: requirement for the Theatre major
Instructors: S. Daniels
Expected enrollment: 36

THEAT-120-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Costume Construction - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course take students through the theatrical process of creating clothing and accessories for the stage. Topics covered are hand sewing techniques, fabric identification and use, and clothing alterations. The course will explore basic pattern drafting and draping, and some accessory construction. Students will work from costume renderings to build and alter clothing for Rooke Theatre productions.
Notes: lab; materials fee $45
Instructors: E. Bergeron
Expected enrollment: 10

THEAT-122-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Scene Design I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and work of the set designer in the performing arts. Students will learn how a designer approaches a script, how this work impacts a production, and what means are used in the execution of the process. They will learn how to develop their own visual imaginations and how to create visual concepts through discussions, renderings, models and some hand drafting. No previous experience in theatre, performance, or the visual arts is required.
Notes: lab; $30 materials fee. Any additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student
Instructors: V. James
Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-124-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Costume Design I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and work of the costume designer in the performing arts. Students will learn how a designer approaches a script, how the designer's work impacts a production, and what methods are used in the execution of the design process. Students will learn how to develop their own visual imaginations and how to create visual concepts through discussions and renderings.
Prerequisites: No previous experience in theatre, performance, or the visual arts is required.
Notes: lab; $30 materials fee. Any additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student
Instructors: A. Walker
Expected enrollment: 12
THEAT-126-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Lighting Design I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and practice of lighting design for the theatre. This course will cover the basics of light, lighting equipment and how to develop a design for a theatrical production. Students will have the opportunity to use the Black Box Light Lab to create their own lighting designs from selected scenes of plays and musicals and learn the basics of programming a computerized lighting board. Students enrolled in this class will automatically be signed up for the Theatre Arts Department Light Prep Crew for the semester, where students learn to hang and focus lights on the Rooke Stage for the department's mainstage productions.
Instructors: L. Dubin
Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-150-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) What Is Performance? - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
What's the difference between acting and being, and how does the idea of "performance" structure this difference? How do we "perform" our own identities, and how do we interpret the performances of others? This seminar offers a basic introduction to performance studies, an exciting new discipline through which everyday life, ritual behaviors, and artistic practices are studied. Perspectives from the arts, humanities, and social sciences will be explored using both textual and performative approaches. This is a speaking-, reading-, and writing-intensive course that includes innovative individual and group exercises.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-171-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Studies in Dance History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Dance 171)
This course is designed to present an overview of dance as a performing art in the twentieth century. Through readings, video and film viewings, guest performances, individual research projects, and classroom discussions, students will explore principles and traditions of twentieth-century concert dance traditions, with special attention to their historical and cultural contexts. Special topics may include European and American ballet, the modern dance movement, contemporary and avant-garde experimentation, African American dance forms, jazz dance, and other cultural dance traditions.
Instructors: C. Flachs
Expected enrollment: 20

THEAT-180-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Introduction to Technical Theatre
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will examine the materials and techniques used in building and operating theatrical scenery. It will include prop building, rigging, and welding for the theatre. Students will learn the skills to work in the scene shop interpreting scenic designs for department productions.
Notes: lab; purchase of design supplies, materials, and theatre tickets is the responsibility of the student
Instructors: S. Hill
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-205-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Acting II: Characterization - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
A highly interactive course, focusing on scene work, using the Stanislavsky approach to acting. Classes include preparation exercises leading to the relaxation, concentration, and imagination of the actor. Practical tools explored in the course are designed to offer the student greater vocal, physical, and imaginative freedom and clarity as well as text analysis skills. Course includes characterization work and introduces the unique nature of the monologue.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 105
Instructors: S. Daniels
Expected enrollment: 14

(Fall) Topics in Performance: Solo Performance
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
Designed for students wanting to stand in their own spotlight, this course examines the art and craft of solo performance, focusing on monologues, soliloquies and TED Talk-type speeches. Coursework includes the observation and analysis of exceptional solo performances on stage, in film and various media. Students will learn and practice skills used by professional actors to relax, focus and engage their audience. Final projects will include the presentation of two contrasting audition monologues or a TED Talk-style presentation open to the public.

Prerequisites: TH105, CUSP 105 or Permission of Instructor

Instructors: S. Daniels

Expected enrollment: 10

(Spring) Topics in Performance: Intermediate Composition: Music and Choreography

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course will continue developing the choreographic tools introduced in Elementary Composition, including phrasing, formal design and counterpoint. The context for this work will be sound, sound design, music and musical composition in relation to choreography. Beginning with simple experiments in listening and moving, voice work, rhythm, syncopation, and counterpoint/polypolyphony, students will go on to explore and develop short choreographic projects inspired by four different musical traditions: Minimalism, Classical/Baroque, Pop/Contemporary, and Sound Collage. Course work also includes readings, video viewings and written reflections on each of the projects.

Instructors: J. Coleman, P. Jones

Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) Topics in Performance: Voice for Performance - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Linklater voice and Alexander Technique will be the tools used to lay the groundwork for healthy, natural, dependable and expressive vocal communication and postural ease for theatre and public speaking. Students will learn how to speak with poise, gain confidence, reduce performance anxiety, and build the range, resonance, and authenticity of their voice and person. Poetry and dramatic texts will be used.

Prerequisites: Permission of Theatre Chair

Notes: Students enrolled for Voice and Movement for the Stage Fall 2013 may take this course.

Instructors: R. Rootberg

Expected enrollment: 14

(Spring) Topics in Design: Costume Crafts: Costumes beyond Clothing

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Designed to explore the art of costume crafts vs. costume clothing, this course teaches students how to create dimensional objects through the use of flat patterning. Students explore how craft work utilizes ways in which sculpture, painting, color theory, sewing, pattern drafting, costume research and theory all come together. Millinery, armor, masks, fabric painting and dyeing, as well as body sculpting will be covered.

Prerequisites: Hand and machine sewing helpful.

Notes: Lab fee $60.

Instructors: E. Bergeron

Expected enrollment: 10

THEAT-222-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Scene Design - *Not offered this year/term

(Fall) Costume Design - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

An introduction to the art and work of the costume designer in the performing arts. Students will learn how a costume designer analyzes a script, approaches research, renders costume sketches, and how this work impacts a production.

Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 100, 120, an art (studio) course or permission of instructor
Notes: lab; purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student—a supply list will be provided
Instructors: J. Ford
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-234-03 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Androgyny and Gender Negotiation in Contemporary Chinese Women’s Theater - *Not offered this year/term
(Taught in English; Gender Studies 204-03, Asian 215-01)
Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China’s social changes and the women’s movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.
Instructors: Y. Wang
Expected enrollment: 19

THEAT-234-GT - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Greek Tragedy and Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Classics 212)
This course examines the evolution of tragedy in classical Athens from choral performance to sophisticated drama through the contributions of the three most important tragedians: Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Attention is given both to the political context in which the plays were performed and to the dramatic effects employed by the playwrights that made the stage an influential medium of powerful artistry. Students will also study the influence of ancient tragedy on film by examining dramatic strategies modern directors employ and the allusions to Greek tragedy found in some innovative films by Roman Polanski, Woody Allen, Jules Dassin, Michael Cacoyannis, and others.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes) plus 1 screening
Instructors: B. Arnold
Expected enrollment: 40

THEAT-243-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Drafting for Theatre - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is an introduction to the essentials of drafting scenic and lighting plans for theatrical productions. Students will be taught the drafting conventions that are specific to the theatre industry. Projects will include the drafting of ground plans, centerline sections, front elevations, and light plots. Students are expected to already have a basic knowledge of theatre vocabulary and an understanding of the design process and technical needs of creating and building a set or lighting design for a theatre production. Drafting projects will incorporate both pencil drawing and CAD software techniques.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 122, 126, or 180, or permission of instructor
Notes: design supplies fee of $25.00
Instructors: L. Dubin
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-251-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Histories of Performance I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
A survey of world performance history, including: the evolution of human language and consciousness; the rise of oral, ritual, and shamanic performance; religious and civic festivals; and imperial theatre practices that position the stage at the dangerous intersection of religious worship, public taste, royal patronage, and government censure. Understanding performance as both artistic practice and social institution, this course emphasizes the role performance has played in changing audiences and as a cultural and political force in various societies. We explore not only how performances were created—in terms of design, dramaturgy, architecture, and acting—but also for whom, and why.
Instructors: H. Holder
Expected enrollment: 25

THEAT-252-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Histories of Performance II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
A historical survey of dramatic texts and world performance traditions from the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries, with attention given to: the influence of print culture on early modern theatrical movements; the rise of nationalism and the creation of dramatic genres; and the effects of industry and technology on experimental modernist forms. Understanding performance as both artistic practice and social institution, this course emphasizes the role performance has played in changing audiences and as a cultural and political force. As such, we explore not only how performances are created—in terms of design, dramaturgy, architecture, and acting—but for whom, and why.
Instructors: H. Holder
Expected enrollment: 25

THEAT-256-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Costume History through the Nineteenth Century - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course surveys the history of Western dress from Ancient Egypt and Rome through the nineteenth century. By investigating the evolution of fashion, students will gain an understanding of clothing's relationship to the arts, architecture, and its function in society. Classes consist of lectures, discussions, and examination of primary resources. Students will be evaluated based on a series of presentations and research projects.
Instructors: J. Ford
Expected enrollment: 15

THEAT-272-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Dance and Culture
(Dance 272)
What are the functions that dance serves in society? How does the dancing body signify cultural values? How is dance a vehicle for the articulation of cultural identities? This course attempts to answer these questions from the perspective of dance anthropology and, on occasion, dance history. We will analyze documentaries and texts that illustrate the diverse manners in which dance ethnographers and historians approach the study of dance as a cultural expression. Balancing breadth and depth, the course focuses on a handful of dance forms from North America, Latin America, Africa, Asia, the Middle East, and Europe.
Instructors: C. Salyers
Expected enrollment: 20

THEAT-280-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Stage Management - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will examine stage management techniques for academic, and professional theatre and explore the role of the stage manager in various theatre environments. Each student will be required to stage manage a production. Students will also be required to work within the stage management requirements of the Theatre Department. This course will examine the fundamentals of stage management techniques. Emphasis on the "Responsible For Everything" role of the stage manager. Students will be required to see and evaluate local theatrical productions.
Notes: theatre tickets, supplies, and materials are the responsibility of the student
Instructors: C. Killion
Expected enrollment: 8

THEAT-281-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Shakespeare
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 211)
A study of some of Shakespeare's plays emphasizing the poetic and dramatic aspects of his art, with attention to the historical context and close, careful reading of the language. Eight or nine plays.
Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr
Instructors: S. Sutherland
Expected enrollment: 18

THEAT-281-02 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Shakespeare
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive; English 211)
A study of some of Shakespeare's plays, emphasizing both the poetic and the dramatic aspects of his art, with attention to the historical context and varieties of critical interpretations, including those of the twentieth century. Nine or ten plays.
Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr or permission of instructor
Instructors: S. Sutherland
Expected enrollment: 18

(Fall) Playwriting
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Writing-intensive; English 205)
This course offers practice in the fundamentals of dramatic structure and technique. Weekly reading assignments will examine the unique nature of writing for the theatre, nuts and bolts of format, tools of the craft, and the playwright's process from formulating a dramatic idea to rewriting. Weekly writing assignments will include scene work, adaptation, and journaling. The course will culminate in the writing of a one-act play. Each class meeting will incorporate reading student work aloud with feedback from the instructor and the class. Students will listen, critique, and develop the vocabulary to discuss plays, structure, story, and content.
Prerequisites: an English writing course, one course in theatre arts, or permission of instructor
Notes: may be re-taken at 300 level with permission of instructor
Instructors: J. Yukich
Expected enrollment: 12

(Spring) Directing
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course is designed to be an introduction to the fundamental theories and principles of directing for the stage. Visual theory, text analysis, collaborative techniques, and organizational strategies are examined and applied in class exercises, including the direction of a major scene. Each student will be required to cast, rehearse, and present to the public a fully realized scene by the end of term. Directing is a complicated activity that requires you to do and be many things, and this course will help you lay the foundation to discovering your own process.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 100 or 105 or permission of instructor
Instructors: N. Tuleja
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-305-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Acting III: Styles - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
"A laugh, a laugh, my kingdom for a laugh!" This performance-intensive course will focus on classic comedic styles, ranging from Shakespeare to Oliver Goldsmith's "She Stoops To Conquer". Through a series of classroom explorations, students will learn how to craft a believable character, using the gesture, vocal, and physical language of certain comedic styles including: Commedia, Slapstick, and Restoration. Each student will present at least one soliloquy and one scene, with the final scene presented to the public.
Prerequisites: TH105 or per I
Instructors: N. Tuleja

THEAT-315-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Performance: Advanced Performance Workshop - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): Topics courses offer a specific approach to performing. They may include mask characterization, physical theatre techniques, acting Shakespeare, and vocal training, among others.
This course is for actors, directors, dramaturges, choreographers, anthropologists, video and visual artists, and designers. This workshop will develop performance pieces collaboratively. Students will work in teams that explore and investigate a chosen theme, a piece of text, or a type of behavior. Student will present weekly projects over the course of the semester. Use of edited sound, images, and video.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor
Instructors: The department

THEAT-320-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Topics in Design: Advanced Costume Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): Various topics in theatrical design, or in related design fields, including theory, practice, and history. Subjects may include opera performance and design, costume crafts, and materials and techniques, among others.
A semester intensive course exploring the art and work of the costume designer in the performing arts. Students will expand on the process "from page to stage," including but not limited to period research, rendering techniques, production documentation, and the process of translating a design in the third dimension. Major stylistic developments in 20th Century costume will be explored. Students will generate a professional level costume design for an entire musical or opera.
Prerequisites: a College level costume design course
Instructors: A. Walker

THEAT-324-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Costume Design II - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Continuing the art and practice of designing costumes for theatre and opera, students investigate the creative process and technical skills of design, read plays and librettos, and conceive their own designs. The course surveys the history of world clothing and of costume design for the performing arts. Students provide their own materials.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 124, 224, an art (studio) course or permission of instructor
Instructors: TBA

Expected enrollment: 12
THEAT-334-02 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Early Modern Drama - *Not offered this year/term
(English 317MD)

All the world’s a stage. This course surveys the era of literary history that invented this powerful idea. The drama of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is a drama obsessively self-conscious, bursting with disguises, confidence tricks, cross-dressers, rituals, masques, and plays-within-plays. Reading Shakespeare as well as his rivals and peers (Marlowe, Jonson, Webster, and others), we will consider how theater, and the idea of theater, illuminates such concepts as desire, evil, gender, and ideology. Plays will likely include Titus Andronicus, Doctor Faustus, The Alchemist, and The Duchess of Malfi.
Prerequisites: English 200 and English 210 or 211
Instructors: S. Roychoudhury
Expected enrollment: 15

THEAT-350-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar: En Garde, a Study of Stage and Screen Violence
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

"All Drama is Conflict." This course investigates how dramatic conflict is represented in theatre, television and film and examines its effect on the audience. Through a series of readings, class discussions, and viewings including, but not limited to, Romeo & Juliet, The Duelists, and Fight Club, students will attempt to answer the question: what is it about human nature that makes us fascinated by violence as a form of entertainment?
Prerequisites: 8 cr in Department
Instructors: N. Tuleja
Expected enrollment: 20

THEAT-350-01 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar: Marlowe, Jonson, Middleton
(English 317MJ)

A seminar on three major early modern dramatists—Christopher Marlowe, Ben Jonson, and Thomas Middleton—focusing on the range of genres, characters, conflicts, and aspirations explored in their plays. These playwrights, along with their contemporary Shakespeare, shaped the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century theatre into a site for performing authority and conquest, national and individual identity, trickery and carnival, desire and sexuality, and complex unfoldings of revenge. Readings of two or three plays by each of the three dramatists will be supplemented by recent studies of early modern theatricality.
Prerequisites: Juniors and seniors; English 200 and 210 or 211.
Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: S. Sutherland
Expected enrollment: 15

THEAT-350-02 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Fall) Seminar: Witches in the Modern Imagination
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333WT)

From the middle ages to the present day, witches have evoked both fear and fascination. Their fellowships (real or fantastic) challenged the prevailing power structures of church and state patriarchies and upset the ordered precepts of the modern world. This seminar offers an overview of the history of witchcraft in Atlantic cultures, with special attention to the early modern British and American colonial eras. We will examine figures of the witch in European art; religious and legal texts that document the persecution of sorcerers; and dramatic, literary, and cinematic representations of witches that have helped to shape our understanding of gender, nature, theatricality, and power.
Prerequisites: JrSr, Gender Studies 101, and required online application, preference to Gender Studies and Theatre Arts majors.
Instructors: E. Rundle
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-350-02 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar: Women in American Theatre and Drama - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333BB)

This course offers a history of women in performance, from the colonial era to the present day. Americans inherited a European theatrical economy that was largely male dominated, though actresses played a central role on stage and in the public imagination. Today, while serious inequities remain, women are gaining access to the most privileged and powerful positions in a swiftly changing field. We are therefore equally interested in how women have participated in theatrical culture—as actors, producers, playwrights, directors, designers, managers, and audience members—and how they have been represented on commercial, experimental, and regional stages, and across genres and communities.
Prerequisites: Gender Studies 101, or Theatre 100 or 251 or 252
THEAT-350-03 - Theatre Arts - 2015-2016
(Spring) Seminar: Women in Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will discuss women who have made a seminal contribution to the way we see and experience the visual world through design and material culture including the performing arts, film, fashion and couture, the decorative arts, gardens and interiors. Students will familiarize themselves with the work of Coco Chanel and her female contemporaries, Gertrude Jekyll, Zaha Hadid, Irene Sharaff, Loie Fuller, Sonia Delaunay, Lyubov Popova, Margaret Macdonald, and Eileen Grey as well as many other groundbreaking luminaries. Students will research and analyze a designer's work, and create written and visual presentations. Students will also design a small project.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Theatre Arts or related subject or permission of instructor
Instructors: V. James
Expected enrollment: 19

Art (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.ART-246-01 - Art (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(Summer) Currents in Contemporary Art
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this course, by drawing on methods that have risen to prominence in art history since its "global turn," we will emphasize the historical contexts for various art currents. We will analyze the diverse artistic, discursive, and economic practices that have constituted contemporary art around the world since 1980. While studying artists from six continents, the class also will examine the venues in which contemporary art is exhibited. Topics will include artists in Port-au-Spain, Trinidad, and Nigeria; public art in Marfa, Texas, and Moscow; biennials in Sao Paulo and Shanghai; and art fairs in Sharjah and New Delhi.
Notes: ONLINE
Instructors: A. Gilvin

X.ART-252-01 - Art (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(January) Color Theory: A Travelogue in Color
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This is a rigorous course that enables artists to deepen how 'seeing' nature translates to a flat surface, while maintaining the illusion of depth. Coupled with exploiting paint, or oil crayon, emphasis rests on expanding drawing skills. Continual observation from actual paintings in the Museum are available to us. Artists can work from either a model, or a still-life.
Instructors: L. Ritz
Expected enrollment: 15

X.CHEM-101-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(Summer) General Chemistry I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Introduces and develops fundamental concepts in chemical science, including stoichiometry, reactions in aqueous solutions, atomic structure, and chemical bonding. The laboratory emphasizes basic skills and quantitative chemical measurements.

Prerequisites: basic arithmetic, algebra, calculator use
Instructors: H. Jayathilake
Expected enrollment: 9

Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.CHEM-201-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(Summer) General Chemistry II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Continuation of General Chemistry I. Topics include thermochemistry and thermodynamics; quantitative treatment of chemical equilibrium with applications to acid-base, solubility, and electron-transfer reactions; and chemical kinetics. Laboratory emphasizes analytical skills and experimental assessment of kinetic and thermodynamic parameters.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 101 with grade of C or better
Instructors: H. Jayathilake
Expected enrollment: 9

X.CHEM-202-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(Summer) Organic Chemistry I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Introduces organic chemistry, emphasizing the principles governing broad classes of reactions. Topics include stereochemistry, nucleophilic substitution and elimination reactions, the chemistry of alkanes, alkenes, alkynes, alcohols, and ethers, and an introduction to infrared and nuclear magnetic resonance spectroscopy. Laboratory work includes synthesis, practice in the techniques of distillation, crystallization, chromatography, molecular modeling, and identifying unknown organic compounds by chemical and spectroscopic means.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 201 with grade of C or better, or permission of instructor
Instructors: G. Snyder
Expected enrollment: 9

Communication (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.COMM-105-01 - Communication (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(January) Speaking With Confidence: Leadership for Women
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
This course helps both experienced and aspiring professional women identify what they want to communicate in all aspects of their lives. Drawing on a variety of theatre techniques used by experienced actors to relax, focus their message, and connect with an audience, this course will coach students in the art of confident and powerful communication. Students will be guided to uncover their unique strengths, develop an authentic and personalized speaking style, and overcome obstacles to delivering their message. Working closely together in a safe and supportive environment, students will complete the course with the presentation of an inspiring speech.
Notes: This course may be repeated for credit.
Instructors: S. Daniels
Expected enrollment: 9

Computing and Technology (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.CMTC-109-01 - Computing & Technology (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(Summer) iDesign Studio
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Designers are continually innovating ways of incorporating technology into today's world, from projections of butterflies on Grammy performance dresses to "smart" purses that sense a missing wallet. The recent emergence of low-cost, user-friendly components is making this new world of design accessible to a broad community. In this course, students will think critically about products already in the marketplace and will be given the tools to create their own designs. A sequence of hands-on workshops on electronics basics and microcontroller programming will provide the surprisingly minimal level of comfort and background in technology required to produce prototypes of these designs.

Instructors: A. St. John

X.CMTC-209-01 - Computing & Technology (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(January) Interactive Design
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Would you like to see your environment come to life? This course will focus on the basics of generating meaningful interactions between humans and machines. We will cover the design and construction of robots that can sense and react to their environment, and we will develop programs that detect faces and react to people in real time. This course is ideal for art students who want their works to move and interact, theater students who want to create an interactive space for performance, or anyone who wants to make their world a little richer with machine intelligence.
Prerequisites: Experience with coding will be valuable.
Instructors: N. Baker

(Summer) Teacherpreneurs and Teacher Leadership: The Changing Role of Educators
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Explore the changing role of educators in a colorful political climate. Education is in the midst of a transformation, and we will learn from and with teacher leaders who are leading the charge. With readings and video-conferencing with National Board Certified Teachers, bloggers, and state teachers of the year, we will discuss how innovative teachers are transforming the profession in issues of equity, evaluation, compensation, curriculum, collaboration, and more. Students will also identify their leadership skills, then build their areas of expertise and develop a plan for potential future leadership.

(Summer) Queering the Curriculum
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course considers how we can think ethically, critically, and in socially just ways about disrupting the silence around LGBTQ issues in K-12 schools. Drawing on work from the fields of anti-oppression education, critical pedagogy, and queer theory, we will explore ways to challenge heteronormativity and heterosexism, and to promote gender and sexuality equity within K-12 schools. Through course work and class activities we will examine heterosexism as a system of oppression; the complexities of sex, gender, and sexuality; the institutional aspects of heterosexism in educational contexts; and contemporary issues facing educators who want to implement LGBTQ curriculum.
Instructors: K. Helmer

X.EDUC-411-01 - Education (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(Spring) Current Issues in Education
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this learning experience, teachers will work on building up their "education policy fluency" based on their own school context. Students will read education news from across the country, including Education Week and blogs from a range of teacher and education bloggers with varied perspectives. Then they will dig into deeper understanding through weekly dialogue with each other and article authors and current teacher leader experts in the field. This course aims to help teachers gain an even stronger understanding of the policy world that influences what we do in the classrooms, in both public and private school settings.

X.EDUC-423-01 - Education (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016 (Spring) Student Teaching in Early Childhood and Elementary Schools
Credits/PE Units: 10; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Students participate in full-time student teaching in early childhood and elementary classrooms for 12 weeks. During this semester-long field-based placement, students hone classroom management skills, implement an extended integrated curriculum unit, deliver lessons in all content areas, and develop a wide range of assessment skills. The practicum culminates in two weeks of Lead Teaching, during which the student is responsible for managing all aspects of the classroom program. Students work with classroom teachers and college supervisors to address Professional Teaching Standards as required by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts' Pre-service Performance Assessment Program.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Students must be accepted into the MAT program
Notes: 5 days a week for 12 weeks full-time student teaching in school site (includes Mount Holyoke College's spring break). This course is graded on a credit/no credit basis.
Instructors: C. Swift

(Summer) Promoting Professional Learning
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is centered around Domain Three of the Teacher Leader Model Standards, with an emphasis on evaluating and creating school cultures for professional learning and professional development design. Modules for this class will include school climate and culture audits, the change process, analyzing school community and data to pinpoint professional development needs, and evaluating professional learning. Teachers will walk away with design plans for creating cultures of adult learning to improve student learning. Available on campus or through videoconferencing from your home device.
FURTHER DEVELOPMENT AS REFLECTIVE PRACTITIONERS.

We will further develop as reflective practitioners, and to use that reflective practice to explore personal leadership development. Critical course concepts will be introduced in a whole group book study format. As a second step, course participants will create individualized learning plans that allow for deeper exploration of topics of personal and professional interest. The menu of options for personalized learning will include further reading in the domains of adult development, professional learning, motivation, and leadership. Additionally, it involves videoconferencing with several nationally recognized teacher leaders.

(Fall) Children's Literature for Educators
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
MAT students only. This course introduces various genres of children's literature, including literature for adolescents; explores issues in interpretation and critique; and examines approaches to using literature in the preK-12 curriculum with an emphasis on making language accessible to English language learners. Students will read a variety of texts across genres and discuss ways to integrate literature into content-area learning as they expand their knowledge and appreciation of children's literature. Literature will be examined from multiple perspectives including literary, sociopolitical, and historical.
Prerequisites: MAT students with permission of instructor.
Instructors: C. Swift

(Summer) Coaching, Mentoring, and Facilitating Instructional Improvements
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course provides opportunities for teachers to design, develop, critique, implement, give, and receive feedback on professional development experiences that align with the Common Core standards and the particular needs of the school/district's participating staff. Modules include staying focused on content while developing collaborative relationships, engaging in reflective dialogue with teachers and administrators, developing leadership skills, professional growth, and technology for collaborative learning. Participants will be able to individualize their learning experience based on an area of choice for personal and professional growth: instructional coaching, mentoring, or peer coaching.

(Fall) The Process of Teaching and Learning: Developing Math/Science/Technology Instruction and Curriculum
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
MAT students only. Students will learn about inquiry-based science/math curriculum and use of technology in PreK-6 classroom. They will construct more extensive understandings of science/math instruction by developing lessons that implement the Massachusetts Frameworks incorporating the Common Core State Standards for Mathematics. They will teach a minimum of three lessons to students in their pre-practicum setting. Emphasis will be on learning diverse management and instructional practices, such as the use of manipulatives, problem solving, cooperative learning, and project-based learning. Students will also become more adept at developing effective approaches to using assessment to guide instruction.
Prerequisites: MAT students only or permission of instructor
Instructors: M. Allen

(Summer) The Hunger Games: Young Adult Dystopia in Popular Culture - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Fin de siècle popular culture has embraced the spectacle of young adulthood and tried to understand it through the lens of dystopic fiction. This course will focus on The Hunger Games (first book) to consider how it understands, interrogates, and shapes young adulthood for a contemporary audience. Questions of gender and agency will direct the exploration of this literary text and its film adaptation. The course is designed to develop the skills of careful reading and effective writing essential to success in undergraduate study. Students will write and revise their work frequently and participate in class discussions to practice asking critical questions and framing persuasive arguments.

(January) Shakespeare and Race
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Through characters such as Othello, Shylock, and Aaron the Moor, this course will explore how Shakespeare staged, to borrow Hamlet's phrase, the "theater of others". We will focus upon how Shakespeare's plays represent race and racial relationships in the early modern context. How do his plays both reinforce and critique socially and culturally constructed assumptions about race? How do they both draw upon and subvert or challenge dramatic conventions of race and why? What can we learn about race and attitudes towards race, in Shakespeare's time and our own, from the questions raised by his plays and their histories of theatrical interpretation and critical response?
Prerequisites: Introductory literature course, particularly a Shakespeare course.
Instructors: M. Pangallo
Jane Austen in Adaptation

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Jane Austen's work stands almost as its own subgenre in the evolution of the novel. Happening at a moment of transitions, her work can be read formally as a bridge between the experiments of eighteenth century realism and what was just to come in the Victorian novel. Although she is often admired for her humor and satire around marriage and sex, the novels also engage with aesthetics, epistemology, and sensibility: political ideas about what constitutes beauty, what it means to know something, and how much one should feel. We will read the completed novels, some of her influences and contemporaries, and critical and theoretical contexts.

Advanced Topics in English: Chicana/Latina Feminist Literature and Thought

(Fall) Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement (Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333CL, Latin American Studies 387CL, Latina/o Studies 392CL)

This seminar surveys works by Chicana and Latina authors. Selections from critical/theoretical works will situate our reading of literature produced by Chicana/Latina authors in the United States. Readings of novels, short stories, poems, essays, and plays by Chicana, Cuban American, Puerto Rican, and Dominican American authors provide students with a range of experiences and literary styles. Students will ask how the diversity of these texts bespeaks a shared or distinct experience across differences. Particular attention will be given to the challenges that Chicana/Latina writers pose towards nationalist movements, literary genres, cultural production, and feminisms.

Ecology Through Animal Tracking

This course will provide students with a field-based understanding of animal ecology, through the lens of animal tracking. The bulk of our time will be spent in the field visiting local habitats. In each habitat, we will discuss the interactions among animal, plant, and abiotic components occurring there. Students will be expected to make progress on their ability to identify animal tracks and sign. This course will entail considerable winter hiking. Students will need to bring lunch, warm clothes and boots and should be prepared for long days in cold, wet, and strenuous conditions. Limited to the number of seats in the van.

Chinese Hollywood - Through the Lens of Visual Literacy

This is an intensive, interdisciplinary course exploring literature and research about China and, more specifically, Chinese women, through the analysis of Chinese film from historical, social, economic, political, and cultural perspectives. Students will develop visual literacy skills to learn to read and do a critical cultural analysis of Chinese film as visual texts. China's rapidly growing film industry, now referred to as "Chinese Hollywood," will also be examined as a cultural phenomenon with influence in China and throughout the world. This course will focus on selected key film directors whose films allow students to explore lives of Chinese and Chinese women. The course will be taught in English and all films will be viewed with English language subtitles.

(January) Hands On - History of the Book
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Every book tells a story - not just the story in the pages, but the story of those pages. How has the book's physical nature changed over time and what are the connections between its material form, meaning, and value within specific historical contexts? What forces have shaped the book's physical nature, and why have these had the effects that they have had? This course will introduce students to the new interdisciplinary field known as "the history of the book". Our course will involve hands-on work with old, rare, and intriguing books and manuscripts.

Performing Arts (Professional and Graduate Education)

Stage Combat
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is designed to teach the fundamentals of stage combat. Students will be introduced to the principles behind unarmed, rapier, and rapier/dagger work. Attention will be given to partnering skills, weapon techniques, mechanics of choreography, and discovering how one safely creates engaging storytelling using the language of dramatic combat. No prior performance background is required, but students will be asked to perform two fight scenes with dialogue. By the end of the course students will have a solid understanding of: safety and partnering, weapon techniques, building, writing, rehearsing, and acting the fight.

Physics (Professional and Graduate Education)

Physics I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This algebra-based introduction to physics covers kinematics, force, Newton's laws, equilibrium, momentum, energy, conservation laws, gravitation, rotation, and oscillations. Jointly with the Physics 2 course, it will provide a good preparation for the physics components of the MCAT.
Prerequisites: Math competency up through but not necessarily including calculus
Instructors: T. Norsen
Expected enrollment: 6

Physics II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This is the second half of the algebra-based introductory physics sequence. Topics, drawn largely from the MCAT syllabus, include fluids and elasticity, thermodynamics, sound and light waves, electricity and magnetism, and atomic structure.
Prerequisites: Math competency up through but not necessarily including calculus
Instructors: T. Norsen

Psychology (Professional and Graduate Education)

Introduction to Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course provides an introduction to Psychology. How do we make decisions, form attachments, and learn a language? Can we inherit schizophrenia? Why are we fearful of some situations and not others? What factors influence the way we form attitudes or develop prejudices? This course addresses such questions to provide an overview of current research in psychology.

(Summer) Adolescent and Adult Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
When we think of human development, we often think of the period between infancy and late childhood. However, contemporary research contends that we continue to develop in crucial ways across the "other" 3/4 of our lifespan. This course surveys human development from adolescence to late adulthood through consideration of major theories and current research relating to social, emotional, and cognitive domains. We will journey through adolescence and explore the search for identity, examine moral reasoning in young adulthood, appraise the classic theoretical approaches to midlife changes, define "successful aging" in late adulthood, and identify issues that surround death and bereavement.

X.SOCAN-251-01 - Sociology and Anthropology (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2015-2016
(January) Origins of Conspiracy Thinking
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
The course will focus on the history of public distrust of the government from the mid-20th century onwards. Using a number of historical case studies, such as the Kennedy Assassination and various conspiracies about President Obama, the course will show how distrust of the government, originally motivated by logical concerns, has transformed the way people think about power in the postmodern era. Students will learn to be able to tell for themselves the difference between rational questioning of authority and blind distrust that leads to questionable claims.
Prerequisites: They should be taking this as a sociology, American studies, politics, or history elective. Students should be at a point in coursework where they are able to conduct research using journal databases.

(Summer) The Inclusive Classroom: Strategies and Interventions for Promoting Learning and Positive Outcomes for All Students
Credits/PE Units: 3; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course surveys the etiology, diagnosis, and remediation of learning differences including dyslexia, attention deficit disorder, autism, as well as factors that influence a child’s readiness to learn. Students present, discuss, question, and exchange ideas that contribute to an overall understanding of special education in the field. With an emphasis on inclusion in schools, students explore the impact of current policies, assessments, and practices. The focus is on adapting the learning environment, classroom structures, and approach to teaching so that all children, regardless of learning strengths and needs are supported to reach their potential and achieve meaningful goals.

This course is a laboratory, a quest, a workshop, a collaboration, a ring of spies. We will read relentlessly, poach ideas, try things that don't work, "kill our darlings," and write things we didn't know we had in us. If that sounds like hard work, it is. And at the end of this course, you will have a revised manuscript in a genre of your choice, experience writing in multiple genres, a vocabulary with which to discuss the craft of writing, a literary community, a stack of ideas to pursue, and the ability to give and receive feedback.

(History 206)

African cities demonstrate the failure of models of development with the aim and ideal of industrialization. This course examines the empty promises of modernity through the lens of African urban history using fiction, film, and city archives. Beginning with Timbuktu and Cairo, the course explores the emergence and decline of trade entrepots, the rise of colonial cities, and the dilemmas of postcolonial economies and politics. Dar es Salaam, Nairobi, Kampala, Kinshasa, Harare, Johannesburg, Lagos, Accra, and Dakar are among the cities studied. Designed for those seeking only an introduction to development as well as those with further ambitions, it assumes no previous knowledge of Africa.

This course examines the discursive relationship between race and law in contemporary U.S. society. Readings examine the ways in which racial bodies are constituted in the cultural and political economy of American society. The main objective is to explore the rules and social practices that govern the relationship of race to gender, nationality, sexuality, and class in U.S. courts and other cultural institutions. Thinkers covered include W.E.B. DuBois, Kimberle Crenshaw, Derrick Bell, and Richard Delgado, among others.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr, Critical Social Thought 248, 249,or 250 recommended but not required

AFCNA-234-01 - Africana Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Black Metropolis: From MLK to Obama
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 234)
"Black Metropolis" refers to the more than half a million black people jammed into a South Side ghetto in Chicago at mid-twentieth century that featured an entrenched black political machine, a prosperous black middle class, and a thriving black cultural scene in the midst of massive poverty and systemic inequality. This course will follow the political, economic, and cultural developments of what scholars considered to be the typical urban community in postwar United States. We will examine such topics as Martin Luther King's failed desegregation campaign; Harold Washington, first black mayor; William Julius Wilson’s urban underclass thesis; and the rise of Barack Obama.
Instructors: P. Smith

(Spring) Black Political Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Politics 238)
This course will focus on the writings of Black political thinkers in the Americas, Africa and Europe. Through critical examination of the conditions against, and contexts within, which the discourses of these thinkers are situated, this course hopes to arrive at some understanding of the principles, goals and strategies developed to contest and redefine the notions of citizenship (vis-à-vis the imperatives of race/racism and the global colonial formation), humanity, development, democracy, and freedom.

(Spring) Topics in Africana Studies: Afro-Latin America: From Slavery to Invisibility
(Latin American Studies 260, History 287AF)
Exploration of the history of Afro-Latin American populations since Independence within and outside the nation-state. We will question why and how to study those whose governments define them not as peoples of African descent but as part of a mixed-race majority of Hispanic cultural heritage, who themselves may often have supported this policy, and who may have had compelling reasons to avoid official scrutiny. Readings include early twentieth-century Latin American racialist theorizing; research using census, economic, criminal, and marriage records; autobiographical works, and analysis of race in textual and musical representations of peoples, regions, and nations.

AFCNA-241-02 - Africana Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Africana Studies: African American Women and United States History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
How is our understanding of U.S. history transformed when we place African American women at the center of the story? This course will examine the exclusion of African American women from dominant historical narratives and the challenge to those narratives presented by African American women's history through an investigation of selected topics in the field.

(Spring) Topics in Africana Studies: The Culture of Civil Rights
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; HIST-280CV)

Students will examine the cultural history of African American political resistance from the early to middle twentieth century. We will study the various art forms that people of African descent have employed to assert their humanity, preserve their identity, and critique oppression of race, class, gender, and sexuality. Fiction, poetry, film, music, theater, memoir, aesthetics, and athletics are the creative devices that we will explore. We will mine the complex cultures of the seminal places and organizations recognized as having played crucial roles in the long black freedom struggle. We will also probe the political contributions and legacies of leading African American cultural figures.

(Spring) Contemporary African American Literature II
(English 251)

This course will examine African American literature and culture in the postwar period as American identities are coalescing around the concept of the US as a world power. Specifically, our task during the semester will be to discuss the myriad ways black authors and artists attempt to interrogate the structure of racial hegemony by creating poetry and prose meant to expand notions of culture and form. We will also examine music, visual art, and advertisements from this era to have a greater sense of the black experience through various cultural representations. Writers will include James Baldwin, Toni Morrison, Ralph Ellison, Michael S. Harper and bell hooks.

(Spring) Urban Policy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 302)
Gentrification, unemployment, crime, failing schools, disinvestment, mass incarceration—what comes to mind when you think of the inner city? In response to a constrained fiscal environment, cities have increasingly adopted neoliberal policy approaches to address seemingly intractable urban problems. The seminar will study current research to assess the political and economic impact of this neoliberal policy regime on housing, education, and public safety.

(Fall) Politics of Decolonization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Politics 321)
This seminar is a critical exploration of the various processes, accounts and theories of colonialism and decolonization in Africa and the Americas. The aim is to chart alternative paths to rethinking the meaning and impact of these terms. Focusing on the various colonial/imperial tools employed to subjugate, exploit and dominate colonized subjects, we will examine how liberal discourses/structures that are assumed to embody the terms of freedom and sovereignty have now become extensions of the colonial they were initially employed to overcome. The main objective of this course is to explore various approaches to redefining decolonization, noting the changing meaning of colonialism.

(Spring) The Visual Culture of Protest
(English 339, CST 339)
This course examines social protests from the perspective of the visual. Examining cultural productions from 1948-2015 we will focus on the geographical specificity of planned and spontaneous protests that have mobilized people into action. We will use a black studies framework to engage the possibilities present in resisting disparate power structures of race, gender, sexuality, class, and region. Artists, musicians, activists, writers, and grassroots organizers of social movements have been ever cognizant of the role of the visual in subverting power structures. We will use this opportunity to place visual culture at the center of a conversation concerning resistance, human rights, political agency, citizenship, and freedom.
Prerequisites: English 199/English 200 or Africana Studies 200.

(Spring) Topics in Africana Studies: African Americans and Sports
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; HIST-301SP)
Students will explore the critical role that athletics and black sports figures have played in debates about racial uplift, citizenship, civil rights, gender norms, and sexuality from the late nineteenth century through the present. Our task will be to examine amateur, collegiate, and professional sports as sites where social markers of race, class, and region. Artists, musicians, activists, writers, and grassroots organizers of social movements have been ever cognizant of the role of the visual in subverting power structures. We will use this opportunity to place visual culture at the center of a conversation concerning resistance, human rights, political agency, citizenship, and freedom.

(Spring) Topics in Africana Studies: Imperial Neoliberalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 307, Critical Social Thought 349NE)
This course is a critical exercise taught at the intersection of two seemingly incommensurable terms, imperialism and neoliberalism. Charting the genealogies of these terms, we will explore the lines of entanglements that hold these two concepts together as mutually reinforcing projects. In part the course will address how self-governance and self-determination under liberal democratic regimes work to accomplish the neoliberal objectives, hence curtailing the legitimacy of the sovereign will as an essential democratic value. This course will also focus on ways neoliberal mandates legitimize the expansion of imperial extractive capacity beyond what physical territorial aggrandizement limited.

AFCNA-341-PW - Africana Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Africana Studies: Power and Exchange in the African Past

Did African nations become poorer in the 20th century because development initiatives were badly executed? inherently exploitative? ill-timed? Looking beyond the caricatures of evil colonial officers, lazy peasants, or greedy elites, who do we see engaged in productive activity and what are they doing? What concepts and categories illumine our understanding of their actions? How does a careful exploration of the nature of exchange and production in Africa revise our perception of the global economy in the present? We will explore three centuries of exchange in Africa and elsewhere: students may focus their research on the history of a market in any part of the world.

(Fall) Topics in Africana Studies: Toni Morrison

This course will examine the work and the centralized black world of the last American Nobel laureate in literature, Toni Morrison. Morrison is the author of eleven novels and multiple other works, including nonfiction and criticism. In a career that has spanned over forty years and has informed countless artists and writers, Morrison's expansive cultural reach can hardly be measured accurately. In this course we will endeavor to critically analyze the arc and the import of many of Morrison's writings. Readings include: The Bluest Eye, Sula, Song of Solomon, Jazz, Playing in the Dark, Paradise, and A Mercy.

(Spring) Black Migrations - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement

This seminar is a comparative examination of the migration of African-descended people within and to the United States. It looks at in succession the original African diaspora through the Atlantic slave trade; the Great Migration of African Americans from the South; the immigration to the U.S. of African-descended people from the West Indies; and last, the movement of Africans from the continent to the United States since 1965 when immigration laws became more inclusive. We will evaluate the process of African Americanization for each new migratory group in all of its cultural and political ramifications. Course material includes articles, books, films, novels, and guest speakers.

(Spring) Black Radicalism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement

The struggles and ideas of transatlantic black radicals have changed the ways we think and study--through the formation of Africana/African-American/Black-Studies--and the ways in which we express thoughts and ideas--through culture and politics. In this seminar, we will study the interdisciplinary history of black radicalism in the 20th century--in the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa. This interdisciplinary history is animated by a central debate over the role of black internationalism, if any, in domestic black radical thought and action, in the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa.

Prerequisites: Africana Studies 200
Notes: There will be a number of shared classes/discussions with the Africana Studies Senior Seminar at Williams College, both in person and through video-conference, who will be sharing the same syllabus. We will make a class visit to Williams, and we will host a visit from the Williams seminar. The shared meetings will be organized around speakers, presentations, and local activists.

(Fall) Anthropology of Play
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First year seminar
We associate play with childhood, a time of spontaneous and creative activity, in contrast to the boring routine of adult responsibilities. And yet play is more than just fun and games. It is through play that children develop lasting cognitive and social skills. For adults too, there can be serious play--play that has real consequence--play that shapes the intimate lives of individuals, as well as entire social formations. In this course, we will explore play cross... culturally, from the Balinese cockfight to American football, from gambling to role playing. We will design games based on the anthropological readings in order to appreciate the game-like qualities of many domains of life.

(Fall) Anthropology of Modern Japan - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
Since the mid-nineteenth century, Americans have viewed Japan as the Orient's most exotic and mysterious recess, alternately enticing and frightening in its difference. Intense economic relations and cultural exchange between Japan and the U.S. have not dispelled the image of Japanese society and culture as fundamentally different from our own. In this course, we will strive for greater understanding of shared experiences as well as historical particularities. Issues covered may vary from one semester to another, but frequently focus on work, women, minorities, and popular culture. Films and anthropological works provide ethnographic examples of some key concepts.

(Spring) Shopping and Swapping: Cultures of Consumption and Exchange
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
We shop for our food, for our clothes, for our colleges. We purchase cars, manicures, and vacations. It seems that there is little that cannot be bought or sold. But we also give and receive gifts, exchange favors, "go dutch" in restaurants, and invite friends for potlucks. This course examines exchange systems cross-culturally, in order to understand their cultural significance and social consequences. It explores how our own commodity exchange system, which appears to be no more than an efficient means of distributing goods and services, in fact contains intriguing symbolic dimensions similar to the gift exchange systems of Native North America, Melanesia, and Africa.

(Fall) Special Topics in Anthropology: Collecting the Past: Art and Artifacts of the Ancient Americas - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
Early European explorers, modern travelers, collectors, curators, and archaeologists have contributed to the development of ancient Latin American collections in museums across the globe. This course traces the history of these collecting practices and uses recent case studies to demonstrate how museums negotiate—successfully and unsuccessfully—the competing interests of scholars, donors, local communities, and international law. Students will learn how archaeologists study a variety of artifact types within museum collections and will have the opportunity to conduct independent research projects using pre-Columbian pottery collections from the Mount Holyoke Art Museum.

(Spring) Special Topics in Anthropology: Feminist Health Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Gender Studies 241HP)
Health is about bodies, selves and politics. We will explore a series of health topics from feminist perspectives. How do gender, sexuality, class, disability, and age influence the ways in which one perceives and experiences health and the access one has to health information and health care? Are heteronormativity, cissexism, or one's place of living related to one's health status or one's health risk? By paying close attention to the relationships between community-based narratives, activities of health networks and organizations and theory, we will develop a solid understanding of the historical, political and cultural specificities of health issues, practices, services and movements.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores the study of ancient foodways with a focus on how and why humans across the globe began to domesticate plant and animal resources approximately 10,000 years ago. The first half of the course presents the types of archaeological data and analytical methods used to study the "agricultural revolution" in a variety of regions. The second half explores a number of themes within the archaeology of food that investigate the relationship between agriculture and sedentism, food and gender, the politics of feasting, and methods for integrating archaeological and ethnographic approaches to the study of food.

(Spring) Special Topics in Anthropology: Risk
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
People in all societies face uncertainty. Dangers, many of our own making, confront us at every turn - in the form of global warming, market collapses, tainted food, epidemics, and accidents at work and on roads. Terrorist attacks and crime have led to the increased control of urban public spaces. Modern institutions and technologies of risk (probability, insurance, audits, sundry regulation) strive to tame chance, to make it manageable, and even potentially profitable, and have contributed to emergent cultures of risk. In this course, we examine these technologies of risk and associated cultural forms, in relation to other means by which people have dealt with uncertainty in the past.

(Fall) Special Topics in Anthropology: Anthropology and Human Rights: Between Devil's Advocate and Rights Advocacy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores anthropological approaches to human rights--a key theme of transnational politics and international law. Anthropologists have contributed to discussions on human rights since the UN Declaration and the field has provided a vibrant platform to analyze ideologies, politics, and practices surrounding human rights. We will survey an array of anthropological studies that approach human rights from the perspective of cultural relativism, contextualization, advocacy, and practice. Students will gain a critical perspective on the seemingly universal rhetoric of human rights by learning how it produces diverse effects in places such as Africa, Latin America, and the Middle East.

The course explores the contemporary scholarship that addresses the role of print literacy and information technology in the history of science, in the formation of identity, and in the development of the postmodern imagination. From the invention of movable print to the "smart phone" and beyond, how we know the world and ourselves as we engage with it is mediated by technology and by society that introduces this technology and is, in turn, changed by it. What are the real differences, and where lie the continuities between our "digital" present and the not so distant past?

Every society is held together by systems of interpersonal and institutional communication. This course examines the nature of communication codes, including those based on language (speaking and writing) and those based on visual images (art, advertising, television). To understand communication in its social and historical dimensions, we study the psychological and cultural impact of media revolutions and then look at ways communication systems manipulate individual consciousness. Illustrative examples are drawn from Western and non-Western societies.

(Community-based learning course)
Margaret Mead once said, "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful, committed citizens can change the world; indeed, it's the only thing that ever has." Anthropology has a long history of engagement in social activism and change. This course examines approaches to activist anthropology in light of the discipline's controversial past. How have anthropologists tried to overcome the legacy of involvement in racist, colonial, and imperialist projects? Is it appropriate for anthropologists to become involved in activist endeavors? This class will examine the theoretical, ethical, and political implications of engaging in social activism, with case studies from the ethnographic literature.

(Spring) Special Topics in Anthropology: Material Culture
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This class examines the role of material culture in American life as a historical lens to interpret the values and meanings people assign to things. We will consider the world in which we live as a means to better understand how human behavior both affects and is affected by material culture. All societies articulate with and are, in part, embodied in and informed by material culture. This is especially true of modern American culture with its "embarrassment of riches" and things. In this class, which draws on historical and anthropological method and theory, we will consider various ways in which American and other cultures around the world consciously and unconsciously define themselves by the things—or artifacts—people choose to produce and consume, live in, play in, read, drive, eat, and wear.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Egg Cells and Embryos: Innovations in Reproductive and Genetic Technologies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Gender Studies 333EG)
This seminar will focus on emerging innovations in the development, use and governance of reproductive and genetic technologies (RGTs). How do novel developments at the interface of fertility treatment and biomedical research raise both new and enduring questions about the "naturalness" of procreation, the politics of queer families, the im/possibilities of disabilities, and transnational citizenship? Who has a say in what can be done and for which purposes? We will engage with ethnographic texts, documentaries, policy statements, citizen science activist projects, and social media in order to closely explore the diversity of perspectives in this field.

(Spring) Special Topics in Anthropology: Anthropology of the Political in the Contemporary Middle East
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This seminar focuses on anthropological studies of how power - both in its open and hidden forms - manifests itself and shapes everyday life in the contemporary Middle East. It explores how authority is established and contested in various domains including bureaucracy and the state; sexuality and the family; religion and civil society; markets and the media. We will trace how experiences of colonization, imperialism, modernization, nationalism, capitalism, occupation, war and revolt mold the conditions of living for peoples of the Middle East. We will also examine how specific forms of knowledge production attribute coherence to the region, allowing its imagination as an object of intervention in the name of development and security.

(Fall) Topics in Anthropology: Writing Capitalism's Ruins
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Critical Social Thought 349WC)
There's a low buzz; we feel nervous. Is this capitalism's end? Have zombie silhouettes hit the horizon yet? Keep checking. Anthropology narrates collective feelings, gives form to the ambience. But what's the ambience of late industrialism; what's it feel like to collapse? As we watch factory buildings crumble, we wonder whether the tap water's clean. The question of how to write the world (anthropologically-speaking) must also be a question of how to survive, thrive, and even flourish. Archaeologists have long explored decadence, collapse, and ruins. Cultural anthropologists now find themselves in the archaeologists' shoes. Drawing from archaeology, cultural anthropology, ecology, and literary theory, this course will be an open-ended, writing-oriented examination of contemporary experiences of ruins and ruination. One area of focus is the effects of capitalism and post-industrialism on people of color and non-English speakers in North America.

(Spring) Special Topics in Anthropology: Who’s Involved?: Participatory Governance, Emerging Technologies and Feminism - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Gender Studies 333PG)
Deep brain stimulation, genome sequencing, regenerative medicine... Exploring practices of 'participatory governance' of emerging technologies, we will examine the formal and informal involvement of citizens, patients, health professionals, scientists and policy makers. What initiatives exist at local, national and transnational levels to foster science literacy? How do lived experiences of nationality, ability, class, race, ethnicity, gender and sexuality become visible and/or disappear within constructed frameworks of participatory governance? How can feminist ethnographic research and feminist theory contribute to a larger project of democratizing knowledge production and governance?

(Gender Studies 333RN)
This seminar explores the potentially novel entanglements of 'race', 'nation' and 'gender' through the increasing transnationalization of scientific and medical practices, the mobility of practitioners and consumers, and the mobilization of scientific and medical knowledge by individuals and communities, as well as governmental and civil society organizations. We will engage with the multiple tensions in feminist research on topics such as diversity, population and medical genomics, and reproductive and medical tourism as the multiple and shifting identities of experts and 'lay' individuals call attention to the power and problematics of scientific, medical and patient 'diasporas'.

Architectural Studies

ARCH-201-01 - Architectural Studies - 2016-2017

(Spring) Introduction to Architecture - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course introduces the many facets of architecture: history, theory, and design of buildings, landscapes, and cities. In addition to surveying architecture from the earliest forms of human habitation to contemporary residences, the course introduces basic analytical skills of architectural representation. Students will develop skills of speaking and writing about architecture, while also learning basic design tools: the sketch, map, plan, elevation, materials study, and landscape setting. Guest architects and theorists will introduce design topics and work with students preparing drawings and designs that are evaluated on effort and realization, not on proficiency.
Prerequisites: Open to first-years and sophomores
Instructors: M. Davis
Expected enrollment: 19

ARCH-205-01 - Architectural Studies - 2016-2017

(Fall) Introduction to Architectural Design: Sculpting Space
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This studio course will be a design investigation of a particular theme in or approach to architecture and the built environment. Students will develop and apply traditional and contemporary architectural skills (sketches, plans, elevations, models, computer diagramming, and various modes of digital representation) to interdisciplinary and socially pertinent design problems. Creative and indexical study and analysis will be used to generate and foster a broad range of concepts and language to solve architectural issues involving site, construction, inhabitation, function, form, and space. Our goal is to apply creative techniques in art and sculpture to the creation of meaningful space.
Prerequisites: One semester of design or drawing is recommended
Notes: Students enrolled in this course will be responsible for some of the cost of materials.
Instructors: T. Long
Expected enrollment: 12

ARCH-225-01 - Architectural Studies - 2016-2017

(Spring) Intermediate Studies in Architecture: Principles of Environmental Design - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This hybrid studio addresses human comfort with lectures and problem work sessions integrated with design projects. We start with an in-depth study of the world's climate regions, the sun, and the earth's tilt and spin. Primary methods of heat transfer are investigated as students research two architectural solutions (vernacular and contemporary) within each climate. Using daylight, the sun's movement, and sun-path diagrams students will design, draw and build a functioning solar clock. Issues in day-lighting and thermal comfort will then drive an extended design problem. Students will be asked to solve numerical problems and present design solutions using both drawings and models.
Prerequisites: minimum 4 credits of architecture design studio; knowledge of algebra and trigonometry.
Notes: Students enrolled in this course will be responsible for some of the cost of materials.

ARCH-225-02 - Architectural Studies - 2016-2017

(Fall) Intermediate Studies in Architectural Design: Introduction to Digital Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course introduces students to contemporary digital design tools in order to better communicate fundamental architectural ideas. Students engage with CAD, 3D modeling, and 2D visualization techniques in Rhino 5 and Adobe CC, until the techniques become an integral part of students' creative design process. Students become proficient in digital drawing and modeling as they craft a short series of cumulative design exercises focusing on the tectonics and articulation of architectural surfaces. Skills are introduced and expanded, but more importantly, students learn to navigate the virtual environment that now more than ever influences a designer's disciplinary interests and creative processes.
Prerequisites: One semester of Drawing I, design, or sculpture is recommended.

(Spring) Intermediate Studies in Architectural Design: Principles of Ecological Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This studio/lecture course explores the ecology of nature's architecture and human-built environments as we "study our living place", and let the ecology of place guide design. Students will closely observe and analyze individual and collective environments and landscapes, case-study examples, ecosystems, wildlife, habitats, and human spaces of form and function. Students will utilize whole-systems thinking, knowledge of environmental issues, Earth elements and the biosphere to better understand and creatively build resilient, environmentally responsible design plans. This interdisciplinary course will be active with literature, group discussions, design work/sharing; and will finish off creative and hands-on activities. Students will expand as ecological designers through weekly journals, visual exercises/sketching, mapping, palette and site-design challenges and projects.
Prerequisites: One semester of design, or environmental studies, or drawing/art studio recommended but not required.
Notes: Students enrolled in this course will be responsible for materials cost and possible field trip transportation.

(Spring) Topics in Architectural Studies: From Weimar to Nazi Germany: Film and Society
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; GRMST-231WN, FLMST-270WN)
Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.
Discussing both canonical and lesser-known films from the Weimar and Nazi period, we explore various artistic tendencies, movements and genres in order to define cinema's complex role in representing social and historical experience. We pay special attention to the modes of constructing cinematic spaces, and the social utopias and catastrophes which cinema came to represent.
Notes: This course includes a mandatory weekly film screening. Taught in English.

(Fall) Advanced Topics in Architecture: Digital Design and Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course investigates new methods of design intelligence specifically associated with digital design and fabrication technologies. The computer is used in its capacity as a design tool, encompassing both digital skills and design thinking. Skills with 3D modeling and 2D visualization softwares are developed through a series of cumulative design exercises. Prototypes are generated using plotters, laser cutters, and 3D printers to confront the reality of virtual constructions. Design discourse is introduced through complementary lectures, readings, and discussions. This course encourages students to seek insight into the conditions that now shape the contemporary design environment.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course surveys architecture from the ancient world to the present as both a functional response to human activity and as a medium that expresses cultural values. In the service of domestic life, religious ritual, political agendas, commerce, and leisure, architecture reflects and shapes the natural environment, technology, economics, and aesthetic taste. While the history of Western architecture constitutes the primary touchstone, we will pursue themes that include buildings, cities, and sites from around the world.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Some of the best feature-length films of the past century have commanded our attention and imagination because of their compelling artistry and the imaginative ways they tell stories visually and verbally. This course closely studies narrative films from around the world, from the silent era to the present, and in the process it introduces students to the basic elements of film form, style, and narration. Some of the films to be considered are: Broken Blossoms, Battleship Potemkin, Citizen Kane, Contempt, The Bicycle Thief, Ugetsu, Rear Window, Woman in the Dunes, The Marriage of Maria Braun, Days of Heaven, and Moulin Rouge.

(Fall) From Alexander to Cleopatra: The Hellenistic World - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Hellenistic art has often been regarded as a chaotic, decadent phase between the golden ages of classical Greece and imperial Rome. Yet the period in the Mediterranean from the death of Alexander the Great in 323 BCE to the Roman conquest of Egypt in 31 BCE saw the creation of some of the greatest masterpieces of ancient art, the development of formal art criticism, and the mass production of art for private enjoyment. The course addresses the new themes and purposes of art in a cosmopolitan culture that, in many respects, was not unlike our own.

At its height, the Roman Empire spanned a vast area, from modern Scotland to Libya and Iraq. Within that territory lived peoples of multiple races, languages, and religions. The course explores the art and architecture created in this global culture from its beginning in 30 BCE to the dedication of the first Christian capital, Constantinople, in 330 CE. Subjects include the arts of engineering and city planning, public propaganda, arena spectacles, homes of life and the afterlife, and mystery religions.

(Spring) Italian Renaissance Art
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This survey outlines the arts in Italy from the late thirteenth to sixteenth centuries, a time of major cultural transformation. To trace these developments, we will take a geographic approach, focusing on cities and societies in order to understand the diverse social networks that linked artists like Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo with their publics. We will also address themes such as the role of women in the arts as both patrons and producers; the rise of print; and the expanding networks of cross-cultural contact that linked Italian cities like Florence, Rome, and Venice to places throughout western Europe and beyond.

ARTH-233-01 - Art History - 2016-2017
(Fall) Renaissance and Baroque Architecture in Italy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course focuses on architecture in Italy—including churches, palaces, villas, and fortifications, as well as city planning—from 1400 to 1700. In this period, architects took their cues from the classical tradition even as they carved out their own territory, developing new techniques and perfecting old ones to realize their designs. We will trace shifting architectural practice through key figures from Brunelleschi to Bernini, and through the lens of larger cultural forces. We will also examine buildings in light of the painted and sculpted decorative programs that were often integral to their overall effect.

(Fall) The Global Renaissance - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The traditionalist view of the Renaissance treats Europe as if it were an isolated hotbed of cultural innovation. This course will reconsider the period as one of intensifying cross-pollination, when European artists were deeply affected by contact with the Near and Far East, Africa, and the Americas. Specific topics will include representations of distant lands and peoples; the collecting of exotic materials; cartography and expanding world horizons; Venice and the Ottoman world; and the reception of classical architecture in Latin America. We will consider many facets of Renaissance visual culture—from paintings and buildings to maps, prints, and illustrated books—that framed these global crosscurrents.

(Fall) Nineteenth-Century European Art: Neoclassicism to Impressionism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course surveys art in Europe from roughly the French Revolutionary era to the last quarter of the nineteenth century, that is, from the neo-classical painters (David and his atelier) at one end and the great painters of modern life in Paris (Manet and his followers) at the other. That chronology represents one of the most important transformations in the history of art: the origins and early development of what we today call "modern art." We will spend considerable time tracing this difficult passage, pausing here and there to readjust ourselves to the shifting language of art and to orient art's relationship to the modern public. Among the major figures to be studied are Constable, Courbet, Delacroix, Friedrich, Goya, Ingres, Monet, Renoir, and Turner.

(Fall) History of Photography
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This survey course traces the rise and development of photography in the United States and, to a lesser extent, England, France, Germany, Mexico, and Russia. It charts the wide range of work with the camera, including commercial, vernacular, and fine art projects, and considers pictures from photography's very beginnings in the mid-nineteenth century to today's practices. Among the major figures to be discussed are Arbus, Brady, Cameron, Carriè-Bresson, Day, Evans, Frank, Johnston, Lange, Mapplethorpe, Modotti, Muybridge, Sander, Steichen, Stieglitz, and Weston.

(Fall) Building the Modern Environment: Architecture 1890-1990
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An exploration of major movements and personalities in architecture from the late nineteenth century to the present. Emphasizing the United States against the background of European developments, the course considers the search by architects, including Frank Lloyd Wright, Le Corbusier, and Frank Gehry, for a language of form and space that captures the contemporary spirit as it elevates society to a higher plane of existence. Discussion focuses on issues of technology and utopia, the skyscraper, and the collision of tradition, modernity, and postmodernism in architecture since 1945.

(Spring) Modern Art: 1885-1945
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines the great ruptures in European art that today we call modernist. It relates aspects of that art to the equally great transformations in European society: revolutionary ferment, the rise and consolidation of industrial capitalism, colonization and its discontents, and world war. It will branch out to compare different kinds of modernisms, including those in Mexico and Russia. Among the major figures to be studied are Duchamp, Matisse, Malevich, Picasso, Rivera, Seurat, and van Gogh.

The multicultural course will survey architecture, sculpture, painting, and other arts of India from the earliest times to the twenty-first century. Students will explore the various arts as material expressions of a relationship between religious beliefs, geography and cultural conditions of the subcontinent of India in different historical periods. Class sessions will also provide opportunities for an examination of cross-cultural issues relating to the study of non-Western art in a Western academic discipline. Students will develop strategies for visual analysis and critical thinking through written assignments, class discussions, and close reading of scholarly articles.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Intended for art history majors, this course gives an overview of the field, its methods, and its career opportunities. As part of this class, students will design their own research projects, conceptualize an exhibition, and meet professionals working in various sectors of the art world. Students will hone their research, writing, and speaking skills, while learning what it means to interpret art through lenses such as formalism, Marxism, gender, and postcolonialism. Students will also write applications for internships, jobs, and graduate programs—the goal being to consider how the art history skills they have acquired as an undergraduate can translate into life after college, in the art world and beyond.

(Fall) Issues in Art History: American Films That Matter
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 270FM)
Certain American films stand out as works of art by combining strong narrative structure with striking visual presence. Ten of those films, from the silent era to the present, will be studied. In addition to weekly discussion, students will be responsible for analyzing opening sequences. Among the films to be considered are: The Grapes of Wrath, It's a Wonderful Life, Sunset Boulevard, Touch of Evil, Vertigo, Chinatown, Blade Runner, Do the Right Thing, and Beasts of the Southern Wild.

(Spring) Topics in Art History: The City as a Work of Art - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will focus on city maps and bird's-eye views in order to explore urban representation and symbolism. Emphasis will be on European imagery from the fifteenth to eighteenth centuries, but the overall scope will range from ancient to modern times, encompassing western and non-western places and works. The class includes units on the history, theory, and form of the city (including utopian and ideal cities); approaches to representing the city (maps, models, pictorial views); and case studies (Kaifeng, Kyoto, Paris, Siena, Tenochtitlan, Venice, and others). The overarching goal is to understand how the essence of the city can be expressed in visual form.

(Spring) Issues in Art History: Pompeii
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Buried in the volcanic eruption of 79 CE, Pompeii provides an astounding level of preservation for fresco, sculpture, and luxury arts in addition to temples, baths, houses, shops, theaters, and streets. The rediscovery of the ancient site since the eighteenth century had a significant impact upon European art and literature. The course examines the surviving environment and artifacts created in the late republic and early empire and considers the history of archaeological and art historical methods and the romantic visions of Pompeii in art, theatre, and film up to the present.

(Spring) Issues in Art History: Ancient Painting and Mosaic - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The course treats the themes, techniques, and contexts of painting and mosaic in the ancient Mediterranean. From Bronze Age palaces to early Byzantine churches, surfaces were embellished with frescoes, pebbles, glass and jewels. These might be rendered in complex geometric shapes or with mythological scenes. Portable vases displayed elegantly drawn figures. We will examine the unique effects of each medium and how they influenced and interacted with each other.

(Fall) Seminar in Renaissance and Baroque Art:: Leonardo da Vinci
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Leonardo da Vinci ushered in the High Renaissance in painting and established an archetype for the visionary that persists to this day. Artist, architect, military engineer, scientist, and author, he has been credited with inventing the helicopter and corkscrew, not to mention new modes of representation. His best known works--the Mona Lisa, the Last Supper, the Vitruvian Man--are among the foremost icons of western culture. In this seminar, our goal is to look at these paradigms, and Leonardo himself, with fresh eyes. By peering into the mind and achievements of one extraordinary individual, we will open a window onto the broader intellectual and artistic concerns of the Renaissance.

(Spring) Seminar in Modern Art: The Art of Modern China
This course will consider the development of modern Chinese art from the overthrow of the Qing dynasty in 1911 to contemporary trends today. Along the way, professional artists in China faced an acute identity crisis: How could they make foreign styles and methods their own? Which aspects of centuries-old ink and brush painting and other traditional art forms ought to be retained and developed? How could art be made to serve ordinary people, not just elites? How much independence was possible in Mao's China? How has commercial success and the internet transformed the outlook of contemporary Chinese artists? As a point of departure, we will examine and discuss traditional Chinese objects in the Mount Holyoke College Art Museum.

(Spring) Seminar in Contemporary Art: Curating Global Contemporary Art - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Contemporary art belongs to a global exchange of ideas, requiring models for understanding its value beyond countries of origin. Museums and galleries regularly showcase artworks from different continents to signal historical interconnections. The course explores the challenges or curating contemporary art. We will study existing curatorial practices, and examine the role of small exhibitions as well as large international art fairs in creating an interlinked, international art community. We will work closely with the Mount Holyoke College Art Museum, and develop exhibition strategies to foreground the global aspect of contemporary art.

(Fall) Papermaking with Local Plants

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

In addition to learning basic paper chemistry in this course, students collect usable sections of a variety of plants wherever they live throughout the summer and in the Pioneer Valley in the fall during the course. These plants are examined and recorded before and after drying, then cooked and processed to become paper pulp. Students conceive and construct their art projects inspired by the historical, biological, ecological, and personal aspects of plants as well as their physical qualities.

Prerequisites: One 200-level studio art course. Five College students require instructor's permission for this course. Email the professor with a list of all the studio courses previously taken.

ARTST-269-01  -  Art Studio  -  2016-2017

(Spring) Japanese Papermaking

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

In this course, students learn the traditional practice and history of Japanese hand papermaking, while exploring contemporary applications of the method. Thin, translucent, strong paper is great for drawing and printmaking, as well as sculptural construction and paper casting. This fluidity of medium naturally encourages students to become interdisciplinary in their art making. The apparent fragility, structural strength, and surprising longevity of the material provides a foundation for philosophical investigations into the nature of creativity.

Prerequisites: One 200-level studio art course
Notes: Students enrolled in this course will be responsible for some of the cost of course materials. Five College students require instructor's permission for this course. Email the professor with a list of all the studio courses previously taken.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Representative Works of Modern Chinese Literature
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English)
The twentieth century started with the downfall of the Chinese monarchy, numerous humiliations at the hands of Western countries, and the establishment of the Republic of China in 1911. In the spirit of reform and renaissance, a group of young writers, educated in both China and the West, spearheaded a new direction in Chinese literature. This group of writers abandoned the classical Chinese language, was keenly interested in social development and betterment, attacked Confucian tradition, and adopted Western ideals. The class will read representative works of these writers and try to understand their sociopolitical impact, while appreciating the artistic qualities of these writings. This class may be especially suitable for students who do not identify as native speakers of English.

(Fall) Androgyny and Gender Negotiation in Contemporary Chinese Women’s Theater
(Taught in English; Gender Studies 204CW, Theatre Arts 234CW)
Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China’s social changes and the women’s movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.

(Spring) Third Year Chinese II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
This course continues Asian Studies 310, Third Year Chinese I, in helping students build linguistic and communicative competence in Mandarin Chinese through reading, discussing, and writing about authentic texts. Newspapers, essays, and short stories will be the teaching materials for the course. An interactive approach will be incorporated into the curriculum to improve students’ conversational skills. The class will be conducted mostly in Chinese, and class hours will be supplemented by individual work in the Language Resource Center.
Prerequisites: Asian Studies 310 or equivalent (contact Ms. Kao for placement)
Instructors: S. Kao
Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) Newspaper Reading and Journalistic Practice in China
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course advances students’ Chinese reading, writing, listening, and speaking skills by studying journalistic reports on the most pressing issues in China and the U.S. It also introduces the formal expressions, writing styles, and terminology commonly used in Chinese media. In addition, the course intends to help familiarize students with various media channels and agencies, understand the challenges of journalistic practice in the internet age, and enhance students’ critical thinking and analytical skills by broadening their perspective and comparing Chinese and English media sources. Conducted mainly in Chinese with the addition of relevant English materials.

Prerequisites: Asian Studies 311 or equivalent required; Please contact Lisha Xu lxu@mtholyoke.edu for placement

Instructors: L. Xu

Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) Advanced Chinese Reading: Literary Works and Social Issues - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement; does not meet a distribution requirement

The course will advance students’ communication skills in Chinese language through the study of contemporary Chinese literary and nonliterary works. The focus of the course is on short stories by famous writers such as Yu Hua, Su Tong, and Wang Meng. The course also features other types of literary materials such as essays, drama scripts, poems, and television dramas. Materials on pressing social, political, and economic issues from scholarly Chinese journals, newspapers, and Web sites will also be used. The class will be conducted entirely in Chinese.

Prerequisites: Asian Studies 311 or equivalent

Instructors: L. Xu

Expected enrollment: 15

(Fall) Learn Chinese through Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course will improve students’ four communication skills (reading, writing, listening, and speaking) by studying contemporary Chinese films, including several prize winners/nominees by internationally acclaimed directors such as Zhang Yimou, Li An, and Chen Kaige. The class will watch the films and then use the synopses and selected dialogues from the scripts as reading materials to facilitate both linguistic and cultural learning. Social and cultural issues reflected in the films will be discussed. The class will be conducted mainly in Chinese.

Prerequisites: Asian Studies 311 or equivalent (contact Ms. Wang for placement)

(Spring) Business Chinese - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

An advanced speaking- and writing-intensive Chinese course focusing on Chinese business communication and culture. Will further improve students' Chinese proficiency and oral communication by using Chinese as a tool to investigate topics in business and business culture in China. As well as the textbook, the course will make use of a variety of supplementary materials, including some in English. Through lectures and other activities, students will gain experience and comfort in reading and discussing business news, producing analytic and technical forms of business writing, translating business-related documents, and other skills for future work in China.

Prerequisites: Asian Studies 311 or equivalent

Notes: Taught entirely in Chinese. Offered as a Nexus course in the Global Business Track.

Instructors: L. Yan

(Spring) Media and Translation

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

The course intends to further advance students' language skills in Chinese through both traditional mass media and the emerging social media. In addition to the four basic language skills (listening, speaking, reading, and writing), oral interpretation and written translation (from Chinese to English and vice versa) will be emphasized in class as a way of deeper comprehension and useful skill of communication. While the reading and viewing materials used in this class are written news reports and news videos, the means of mock publication include some interactive social media tools such as blogs and podcasts.

(Fall) Love, Gender-Crossing, and Women's Supremacy: A Reading of The Story of the Stone - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Gender Studies 333HH)
A seminar on the eighteenth-century Chinese masterpiece The Story of the Stone and selected literary criticism in response to this work. Discussions will focus on love, gender-crossing, and women's supremacy and the paradoxical treatments of these themes in the novel. We will explore multiple aspects of these themes, including the sociopolitical, philosophical, and literary milieu of eighteenth-century China. We will also examine this novel in its relation to Chinese literary tradition in general and the generic conventions of premodern Chinese vernacular fiction in particular.
Prerequisites: jr, sr

(Fall) Topics in Asian Art: Bollywood: A Cinema of Interruptions - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Art History 360BC, Film Studies 370BC)
How are we to respond to Indian popular film, which is notorious for its distracting song and dance numbers, meandering story line, and visually overblown spectacles? This seminar will develop historical and theoretical approaches to Indian films as what scholar Lalitha Gopalan calls a "constellation of interruptions." Students will examine feature films in class, write critical papers on scholarly essays, and pursue independent research projects on various aspects of Indian film.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in art history or film studies
Instructors: A. Sinha

ASTR-110-MA - Astronomy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Exploration of Mars
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Exploration of Mars is an ongoing effort that has greatly expanded our knowledge of the Red Planet and changed our vision of its surface. We will examine the history of the investigation and exploration of Mars. We will also plan future observations from orbiting spacecraft, engage with scientists involved in current missions, and imagine the best ways to explore Mars in upcoming decades. Developing physical intuition and analytical skills in astronomy, geology, physics and other sciences will be emphasized, as well as speaking and writing ability.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: D. Dyar
Expected enrollment: 16

ASTR-115-01 - Astronomy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Astronomy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A comprehensive introduction to the study of modern astronomy, covering planets--their origins, orbits, interiors, surfaces and atmospheres; stars -- their formation, structure and evolution; and the universe -- its origin, large-scale structure and ultimate destiny. This introductory course is for students who are planning to major in science or math.

Instructors: A. Jaskot
Expected enrollment: 19

ASTR-223-01 - Astronomy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Planetary Science - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This intermediate-level course covers fundamentals of spectroscopy, remote sensing, and planetary surfaces. Discussions will include interiors, atmospheres, compositions, origins, and evolution of terrestrial planets; satellites, asteroids, comets, and planetary rings.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 100/101 and one semester of a physical science course.
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 30

ASTR-226-01 - Astronomy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Cosmology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Cosmological models and the relationship between models and observable parameters. Topics in current astronomy that bear upon cosmological problems, including background electromagnetic radiation, nucleosynthesis, dating methods, determinations of the mean density of the universe and the Hubble constant, and tests of gravitational theories. Discussion of questions concerning the foundations of cosmology and its future as a science.
Prerequisites: Astronomy 100 or 101, one semester of physics, and one semester of calculus at high school or college level
Instructors: J. Young
Expected enrollment: 19

ASTR-228-01 - Astronomy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Astrophysics I: Stars and Galaxies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A calculus-based introduction to the properties, structure, formation, and evolution of stars and galaxies. The laws of gravity, thermal physics, and atomic physics provide a basis for understanding observed properties of stars, interstellar gas, and dust. We apply these concepts to develop an understanding of stellar atmospheres, interiors, and evolution, the interstellar medium, and the Milky Way and other galaxies.
Prerequisites: Physics 110 and Math 102/202; Physics 201 and Math 203 strongly suggested
Instructors: J. Young

ASTR-330-01 - Astronomy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Seminar: Topics in Astrophysics: Moon - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): In-class discussions will be used to formulate a set of problems, each designed to illuminate a significant aspect of the topic at hand. The problems will be difficult and broad in scope: their solutions, worked out individually and in class discussions, will constitute the real work of the course. Students will gain experience in both oral and written presentation. Topics vary from year to year.
This course will survey the past, present, and future of lunar exploration and science. We will focus on the evolution of the Moon as a paradigm for terrestrial planets, with specific units on interiors, heat flow, thermal evolution, magnetism, volcanism, volatiles, impacts, crustal composition and mineralogy, regoliths, and spectroscopy of its surface. This is a discussion-based, interactive seminar with students and faculty reading current papers from the literature.
Prerequisites: any intermediate-level astronomy or geology course; Astronomy 223 recommended
Instructors: D. Dyar

Biochemistry

BIOCH-295-01 - Biochemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Independent work in biochemistry can be conducted with any member of the biochemistry committee and, upon approval, also with other members of the biological sciences and chemistry departments and program in neuroscience and behavior.
Notes: Students conducting an independent lab research project for credit in a department, program, or lab covered by the College's chemical hygiene plan must participate in a safety training session before beginning research; credit will not be granted to students who do not receive safety training.

(Fall) Protein Biochemistry and Cellular Metabolism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement (Biological Sciences 311, Chemistry 311)
This course is a rigorous introduction to the study of protein molecules and their role as catalysts in the cell. Topics include general principles of protein folding, protein structure-function correlation, enzyme kinetics and mechanism, carbohydrate and lipid biochemistry, and metabolic pathways (catabolic and anabolic) and their interaction and cross-regulation. Biological transformation of energy is considered in light of the principles of thermodynamics.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 230 or 210, Chemistry 302. Must be a biochemistry major.

Expected enrollment: 30

BIOCH-314-01 - Biochemistry - 2016-2017
(Spring) Nucleic Acids Biochemistry and Molecular Biology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is an in-depth examination of DNA and RNA structures and how these structures support their respective functions during replication, transcription, and translation of the genetic material. Emphasis is on the detailed mechanisms associated with each step of gene expression. Discussions incorporate many recent advances brought about by recombinant DNA technology.
Prerequisites: Biochemistry majors only. BIOCH-311.

BIOCH-330-01 - Biochemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Biochemistry and Molecular Biology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course each year examines a number of important and exciting topics in biochemistry, molecular biology, and other related fields of biology. The intellectual and research development that formulated these fundamental concepts is traced through extensive readings of the primary literature. Discussions emphasize the critical evaluation of experimental techniques, data analysis, and interpretation. Substantial student participation in the form of oral presentation is expected. This course will focus on antibiotic resistance and the emergence of drug-resistant bacteria.
Prerequisites: Biochemistry 311. Can have Biochemistry 311 as a co-requisite.
Instructors: K. McMenimen
Expected enrollment: 16

BIOCH-399-01 - Biochemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Comprehensive Seminar - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
A seminar series consisting of meetings to discuss articles and material from the current biochemical literature. Students will attend lectures, write papers, and give presentations in culmination of their biochemistry experience. Discussions relevant to graduate school applications and careers in biochemical fields will also be held.
Prerequisites: Juniors and senior biochemistry majors only.
Notes: Highly recommended to be completed during the second semester of junior year or the first semester of the senior year.
Instructors: K. McMenimen

Biological Sciences

BIOL-110-01  - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Biology and the Other Humanities
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Living things have been a part of the human experience from its beginning. In this class, we will look at biology from perspectives that we usually associate with the humanities. We will read Aristotle and Lucretius, and we will examine insects painted into the margins of illuminated manuscripts. We will compare the evolution of sacred texts, the evolution of languages, and the evolution of life. Topics drawn from modern work include deep history (the study of human history before there were written records), the role of metaphor in biology, and whether we share our sense of what is beautiful with the other higher animals.

Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: S. Rachootin
Expected enrollment: 16

BIOL-110-02  - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Celebrated Science: Fluorescent Jellyfish, River Blindness, and Stem Cells
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First year seminar
What do the Nobel Prizes have to do with everyday life? Are Nobel Laureates extraordinary scientists, or singled out from others equally worthy? Readings will include essays, short fiction, and scientific publications, from Nobel Laureates to Beatrix Potter. Students will look through microscopes, correspond with practicing scientists, and try many styles of writing. When the 2016 Nobel Prizes are announced in October, we will read press coverage to study how scientific discoveries are reported. Our semester will end at the time of the Nobel Awards ceremonies with a celebratory banquet. This course is open to all who are curious about the natural world; no science background required.

Prerequisites: FY
Instructors: R. Fink
Expected enrollment: 16

BIOL-145-01  - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introductory Biology: Animal Bodies, Animal Functions
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
How are animal bodies built to deal with living on earth? In this course we will study the function of cells, organs, and organ systems that have evolved to help animals make their way through the physical and chemical environment. In lecture and in lab, we will consider the common needs of animals - needs such as feeding, breathing, and reproducing - and the diverse solutions they have devised. A range of life, from unicellular organisms to animals with backbones (including mammals), will be considered.

Notes: 24 first year seats and 12 sophomore seats. Registration in one of the two co-requisite labs, BIOL-145ABL-01, L-02 or L-03 is also required.
Instructors: S. Bacon
Section Instructors: 01 LAB S Bacon | 02 LAB S Bacon | 03 LAB TBD |
Expected enrollment: 36

BIOL-145-02  - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introductory Biology: Organismal Biology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course encompasses a broad range of concepts central to our understanding of how organisms function and evolve. We will investigate important biological processes, such as photosynthesis and metabolism, and systems, such as the cardiovascular and immune systems. We will also take a holistic view of biology and use our newly acquired knowledge to explore such diverse topics as: the evolution of infectious diseases, the consequences of development and design on the evolution of organisms, and how the physiology and behavior of animals might affect their responses to global climate change.

Prerequisites: FY
Notes: Registration in one of the two co-requisite labs, BIOL-145RGL-01 or L-02, is also required.
Instructors: R. Brodie

BIOL-145-03 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introductory Biology: A Green World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This course examines the plant life in the woods and fields around us, the exotic plants in our greenhouses, and the plants we depend on for food. We will study plants living in surprising circumstances, settling into winter, escaping from gardens, reclaiming farmland, cooperating with fungi and insects, and fighting for their lives. We will find that plants challenge some conventional, animal-based assumptions about what matters to living things. In labs, students will seek to answer their questions about how plants grow in nature, by studying plant structure and function, ecology, and evolution.

Prerequisites: fy

Notes: Registration in one of the two co-requisite labs, BIOL-145GWL-01 or L-02, is also required.

Instructors: A. Frary

Section Instructors: 01 LAB A Frary | 02 LAB A Frary |

Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-145-04 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introductory Biology: Introduction to Biological Inquiry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This class will help students develop a basic understanding of how knowledge in biology is generated, and begin to acquire the skills necessary to conduct their own research and understand basic data analysis. Students will discuss socially relevant sciences issues with an emphasis in learning about evolution and organismal biology, as they gain experience formulating hypotheses and critically evaluating evidence.

Prerequisites: fy

Notes: Registration in one of the two co-requisite labs, BIOL-145BNL-01 or L-02, is also required.

Instructors: P. Brennan

Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-160-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Integrated Introduction to Biology and Chemistry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This 8-credit course serves as a gateway to both the biology and chemistry core curricula. The course introduces and develops fundamental concepts in chemistry while also exploring the diverse range of strategies adopted by living systems to survive in different environments. This course prepares students for further study in chemistry (Chemistry 201) and/or biology (Biology 200). Students must register for both Biology 160 and Chemistry 160 as well as a single lab section (listed under Chemistry 160L). Recommended for students interested in completing pre-health requirements or advanced study in biochemistry or neuroscience.

Prerequisites: fy

Notes: Students must co-enroll in Biology 160 and Chemistry 160 for a total of 8 credits; three 50 minute lectures, three 75 minute lectures, and one three-hour laboratory per week.

Instructors: J. Andras, K. Broaders

Expected enrollment: 48

BIOL-200-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introductory Biology II: How Organisms Develop

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

An overview of cells to tissues to organisms. Cellular components, the role of the nucleus, cell reproduction, and meiosis will be examined as part of our study of gamete production, fertilization, embryology, and development in an invertebrate (sea urchins), a vertebrate (chick), a fern, and a flowering plant. The basic molecular biology of DNA, RNA, and protein synthesis will be presented and examined in the context of building a fly embryo and a flower.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 145, 146, or 160, or Neuroscience & Behavior 100

Instructors: R. Fink, A. Frary

Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department | 02 LAB The department | 03 LAB The department | 04 LAB The department |

BIOL-203-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Teaching Children Science: College Students in the Elementary Classroom

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Community-based learning course; Educational Studies 203)

This course is designed for science students with interests in teaching and learning with children. It will focus on research, theory and practice pertinent to science education, linking scientific information gained in college classes to children's learning of scientific phenomena. Weekly class meetings (from 1-3 hours) will include laboratory and off-site field investigations. Each student will also become a "Science Buddy" at a local elementary school, assisting children with hands-on science experiences for at least 1 hour each week.

Prerequisites: One year of college science (any discipline), at least one course with laboratory. By permission of instructor only; please email rfink if interested in being considered
Instructors: R. Fink
Expected enrollment: 10

BIOL-206-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Local Flora
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course offers plant identification and natural history, emphasizing native and introduced trees and wildflowers. On- and off-campus field trips.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in the department
Instructors: A. Frary
Expected enrollment: 11

BIOL-220-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Cell Biology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The aim of this course is to understand the fundamental unit of life--the cell--at the molecular level. We will consider the assembly and structure of cellular membranes, proteins, organelles, and the cytoskeleton, as well as their roles in cellular processes including the capture and transformation of energy, catalysis, protein sorting, motility, signal transduction, and cell-cell communication. Emphasis will be placed upon the diversity of cellular form and function and the cell biological basis for disease. The laboratory portion of this course will illustrate and analyze these phenomena through selected biochemical, genetic, and microscopy-based approaches.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 200 or 210, plus Chemistry 201 (can be taken concurrently).
Instructors: The department
Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department
Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-223-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Ecology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course will cover the fundamental factors controlling the distribution and abundance of organisms, including interactions with the abiotic environment, fitness and natural selection, population growth and dynamics, species interactions, community dynamics, and diversity. We will address variation across space and time. The course will combine observational, experimental, and mathematical approaches to some of the applications of ecological theory, including conservation, disease dynamics, and biological control.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 145 or 160 plus at least one semester of Calculus or Statistics (which may have been taken in high school, but then instructor permission will be required for registration)
Notes: Biology 223 and/or Biology 226 must be taken for the Biology major.
Instructors: M. Hoopes
Section Instructors: 01 LAB M Hoopes | 02 LAB M Hoopes | 03 LAB M Hoopes | 04 LAB M Hoopes |
Expected enrollment: 44

BIOL-226-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Evolution
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The mechanisms of evolutionary change within populations and between species; patterns of change in space, time and form; and the origin of adaptations. These approaches make sense of the diversity of life. Then we turn to the evolution of developmental pathways, as a way of approaching the unity of life.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 or 223
Instructors: S. Rachootin
Section Instructors: 01 LAB S Rachootin | 02 LAB S Rachootin | 03 LAB S Rachootin |
Expected enrollment: 45

BIOL-230-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Cell and Molecular Biology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Cells are the smallest common denominator of life: the simplest organisms are single cells, while others like ourselves are composed of vast communities of cells. In this course, we will learn how cellular structure and function is orchestrated by biological molecules, most notably the genome and the proteins it encodes. Topics will include genetic inheritance, gene and protein regulation, cellular processes including transport, energy capture, and signaling, the cellular and molecular basis for disease, and modern techniques including genomics, bioinformatics, and microscopy. The laboratory component will illustrate and analyze these topics through selected experimental approaches.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 201 and Biological Sciences 200. Students who have completed BIOL-210 or BIOL-220 should not take BIOL-230.
Instructors: A. Camp, C. Woodard
Section Instructors: 01 LAB TBA | 02 LAB TBA | 03 LAB TBA | 04 LAB TBA |
BIOL-234-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Biostatistics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The statistics sections of biology articles have become so technical and jargon-filled that many biologists feel intimidated into skipping them or blindly accepting the stated results. But how can we ask relevant questions or push the boundaries of knowledge if we skip these sections? Using lectures, data collection, and hands-on analysis in R, this course will connect statistics to biology to help students develop a gut instinct for experimental design and analysis. We will explore sampling bias and data visualization and review methods and assumptions for the most common approaches with examples from current biological literature and our own data.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Biology or ES 200
Instructors: M. Hoopes, S. Cox
Expected enrollment: 22

BIOL-236-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Biological Sciences: Biology of Terrestrial Arthropods - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Evolutionary history of the terrestrial arthropods (body plans, relationships, fossil history); physiology (the implications of cuticle, thermoregulation, flight); reproduction (life cycles, metamorphosis, mating systems); behavior (communication, sociality); ecology (parasitism, mutualism, predator-prey and plant-insect interactions). Each student will collect, mount, and identify specimens for her own collection.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor
Instructors: S. Rachootin
Expected enrollment: 12

BIOL-295-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: soph, permission of instructor
Notes: Note: Any student conducting an independent laboratory research project for course credit in a department, program, or laboratory covered by the College's chemical hygiene plan must participate in a safety training session before beginning research. Course credit will not be granted to students who do not receive safety training. See department for requirements.
Instructors: The department

BIOL-295-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: soph, permission of instructor
Notes: Note: Any student conducting an independent laboratory research project for course credit in a department, program, or laboratory covered by the College's chemical hygiene plan must participate in a safety training session before beginning research. Course credit will not be granted to students who do not receive safety training. See department for requirements.

BIOL-301-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Regenerative Medicine: Biology and Bioethics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
What is regenerative medicine? What is the science that drives new medical therapies using stem cells? We will study the biology of adult, embryonic, and induced pluripotent stem cells, as well as the legal, ethical, and moral implications of using these cells in medical therapies. Each member of the class will participate in a staged debate on these issues for an introductory biology class. Pending funding, we may travel to Washington, D.C.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor only, with Biological Sciences 220 or equivalent expected
Instructors: R. Fink
Expected enrollment: 10

BIOL-302-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Molecular Evolution
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course examines the dynamics of evolutionary change at the molecular level, the effects of various molecular mechanisms on the structure and function of genes and genomes, and the methodology involved in dealing with molecular data from an evolutionary perspective. Lab work will be devoted to learning ways to analyze DNA sequence data and to create and evaluate trees that use molecular data.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 and 226
Instructors: A. Frary

BIOL-305-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Cellular and Molecular Aspects of Development  - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
Examines the roles of cellular movement and cellular interaction in the development of multicellular organisms. Topics include cell recognition and adhesion during morphogenesis, the importance of extracellular matrices, and current theories of embryonic pattern formation. Self-designed laboratories include techniques such as microsurgery and time-lapse video microscopy using a wide variety of embryos and cell types.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 200, 210, and 220
Instructors: R. Fink

BIOL-307-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Vertebrate Anatomy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
We will study the structure, function and evolution of the diversity of structures that allow vertebrates to perform basic functions such as locomotion. We will connect the functions with day-to-day challenges for vertebrates, and we will discuss functional disruption such as disease and trauma. In lab we will dissect fresh-frozen and formaline-preserved vertebrates. A willingness to work with such preserved material is critical to success in class. Students are expected to work in groups during class time, as well as read the required chapters before class. This class requires you to memorize the names of several structures in a functional context.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 220, 230, or 226
Instructors: P. Brennan

BIOL-308-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Darwin
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; History 361DA)
This course looks at the scientific content and intellectual context of Darwin's theory of evolution - his facts, metaphors, hypotheses, and philosophical assumptions. Readings from Darwin and his sources, and examination of the organisms he studied. A background in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century history or whole organism biology is recommended.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 226 or History 248
Instructors: S. Rachootin

BIOL-310-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Invertebrate Zoology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course looks at the evolutionary relations of the profoundly different groups of animals in light of their structure, development, and fossil history. Emphasizes exceptional organisms that prove and disprove biological rules. Themes include coloniality, asexual reproduction, metamorphosis, and making skeletons.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 226
Instructors: S. Rachootin

BIOL-311-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Protein Biochemistry and Cellular Metabolism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Biochemistry 311, Chemistry 311)
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 230 or 210, Chemistry 302; Biochemistry majors only
Instructors: K. Berry

Expected enrollment: 12

Expected enrollment: 16

Expected enrollment: 24
BIOL-315-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Behavioral Ecology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Writing-intensive)
In this course, students learn to view and understand animal behavior within an evolutionary context. The mechanistic side of behavior is investigated and students explore how behavioral traits originate and evolve over time. Students will integrate their knowledge of how organisms work with an appreciation of why they work the way they do. At the end of the course, students will understand basic concepts in behavioral biology and know many of the experiments that have facilitated our understanding of this field. They will be able to construct hypotheses and design experiments that address behavioral phenomena. The laboratory portion of this course is based on individual projects.
Prerequisites: 8 credits of biology at the 200 level with 223 or 226 strongly recommended
Instructors: R. Brodie
Section Instructors: 01 LAB R Brodie | 02 LAB R Brodie |
Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-316-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Scanning Electron Microscopy
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Geology 316)
Includes theory and operation of the scanning electron microscope and preparation of biological and geological materials for observation. The versatile use of the microscope will be emphasized and will include low magnification, high resolution, and back scattered (reflected) electron modes of operation as well as operation at different pressures. Energy dispersive X-ray microanalysis will be introduced.
Prerequisites: 4 credits of biological sciences or geology course at the 200 level
Instructors: B. Carbajal-Gonzalez
Section Instructors: 01 LAB B Carbajal-Gonzalez |
Expected enrollment: 10

BIOL-320-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Transmission Electron Microscopy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Basic principles of transmission electron microscopy (TEM) and potential uses in biological studies. Each student selects a project and learns the fundamentals of specimen preparation, operation of the TEM, and image acquisition. Preparation, assessment and interpretation of the resulting electron micrographs culminate in an individual portfolio.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 220, Per I
Instructors: B. Carbajal-Gonzalez
Expected enrollment: 4

BIOL-321-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Conference Course: The Neurobiology of Stress
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
In this seminar, students will gain a thorough understanding of the stress response system, referred to as the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis. Using primary literature, the course will cover various facets of the HPA axis, including the cellular and anatomical neuroscience behind the stress response. Students will gain an understanding of the techniques commonly used to assess acute and chronic HPA axis activity and behavioral reactivity in humans and in a variety of non-human animals. We will explore how genes and the environment interact to determine how an individual will respond to a stressor and examine irregular activity of the HPA axis in neuropsychiatric disorders, including Anxiety, Depression, and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.
Prerequisites: Neuroscience and Behavior majors. Psych 200 or Bio 220 preferred.
Instructors: A. Hamel
Expected enrollment: 14

BIOL-321-02 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conference Course: Cell Signaling and Disease - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this course we will explore the nature of degenerative diseases and review current literature aimed at understanding the molecular mechanisms driving their development. We will study how cellular communication breaks down with age leading to degenerative diseases, such as cardiovascular disease, diabetes, macular degeneration, and cancer.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 220 or 230
Instructors: K. Schreiber
Expected enrollment: 24
(Spring) Conference Course: Addiction, Superior Memory, and Diseases of the Brain
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this course, we will explore diseases of memory as well as extreme instances of phenomenal memory. We will review primary research literature and case studies to explore the changes that underlie addiction and memory. After reviewing the scientific literature, we will manipulate memory-related pathways in the brain of mice then evaluate the resulting changes in memory formation and behavior. This course will enable students to relate behavioral changes to changes in brain function.
Prerequisites: BIOL-200, BIOL-220
Instructors: A. White
Section Instructors: 01 LAB A White | 02 LAB A White |
Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-321-04 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conference Course: Evo-Devo of Human Anatomy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
This course will explore how evolution and developmental biology illuminate our understanding of human anatomy. Combining lecture and discussion of the current literature, we will examine how major gene signaling pathways pattern the body and particular organs. These investigations into genetic analysis and comparative embryology will guide our discussions about the origin of some of the unusual aspects of our anatomy, including the evolutionary trade-offs that may lead to features that are prone to difficulties.
Prerequisites: BIOL-220 or BIOL-230
Instructors: A. Price
Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-321-B - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Conference Course: Biology of Aging
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Biology of Aging explores the molecular mechanisms regulating human aging. Topics include general biology of aging, genetics of longevity, cellular aging, human longevity, and potential interventions to modulate human aging. Emphasis will be placed on age-related diseases as well, including cancer, diabetes, and Alzheimer's disease. In the laboratory component, we will examine genetic and pharmacological ways to regulate lifespan of the model organism, c. elegans.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 and 220
Instructors: K. Schreiber
Section Instructors: 01 LAB K Schreiber | 02 LAB K Schreiber |
Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-321-E - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conference Course: Extreme Life - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course will focus on biological systems that push the limits of structural and physiological possibility. For example, midges flap their wings at up to 1000 Hz; bar-headed geese migrate over Mount Everest; deep-sea fish withstand pressures near 300 atmospheres; certain frogs can allow their body temperatures to drop below 0 degrees Celsius. Through readings and discussions we will explore the diverse mechanisms that underlie how organisms reach extreme levels of performance and survive in extreme environments.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 220 plus 1 additional Biological Sciences course above 200
Instructors: G. Gillis
Expected enrollment: 10

BIOL-321-P - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conference Course: Molecular Ecology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Over the past quarter century, molecular genetic methods have become increasingly important in ecological research. In this course, we will examine contemporary molecular genetic tools and learn how they can be used to answer ecological questions. Topics will include: reconstruction of ancestral relationships; measuring the size, diversity, and spatial structure of populations; characterization of migration and dispersal patterns; and identification of sensitive or threatened species and populations. We will explore these themes through foundational texts and current scientific literature, and we will analyze molecular genetic datasets in class to gain familiarity with available techniques.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 or 223 or 226.
Instructors: J. Andras
Expected enrollment: 16

BIOL-321-R - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conference Course: Race and Biology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this student-centered, discussion-based seminar, we will explore hypotheses about the evolution of human variation and how our ideas about race intersect with new information from the human genome. We will focus on three main themes: genes, geography, and human variation; the misuse of evolutionary biology in the construction of race; and race in the age of the human genome.

Prerequisites: Any 200 level Biology course

Notes: Class materials will be drawn from primary scientific literature, books by evolutionary biologists and film. Student learning will be evaluated through writing assignments, presentations, and participation in online and face-to-face discussions.

Instructors: R. Brodie

Expected enrollment: 24

BIOI-322-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017

(Spring) Comparative Biomechanics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

(Physics 222)

The main objective of this course is to explore organismal structure and function via an examination of the basic physical principles that guide how living things are constructed and how organisms interact with their environment. We will use the combined approaches of the biologist and engineer to study the impact of size on biological systems, address the implications of solid and fluid mechanics for animal design, survey different modes of animal locomotion, and learn how biologists working in diverse areas (e.g., ecology, development, evolution, and physiology) gain insight through biomechanical analyses.

Prerequisites: any two courses above Biological Sciences 200

Instructors: G. Gillis

Section Instructors: 01 LAB G Gillis | 02 LAB G Gillis |

Expected enrollment: 20

BIOI-325-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017

(Fall) Plant Diversity and Evolution - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This course explores the tremendous diversity of the plant kingdom, emphasizing the local flora. Evolutionary relationships are discussed on the basis of comparisons of reproductive biology, morphology, anatomy, cell structure, and molecular biology.

Prerequisites: two of Biological Sciences 200, 210, 223 or 226

Notes: offered alternate years

Instructors: A. Frary

Section Instructors: 01 LAB A Frary |

Expected enrollment: 12

BIOI-326-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017

(Fall) Ocean Blues: State of the World's Oceans

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This seminar explores the science behind pressing issues facing our oceans, such as coastal eutrophication, ocean acidification and overfishing. Professors from the Five College Coastal and Marine Sciences (FCCMS) certificate program, representing different science disciplines, will engage with students in this discussion-based course. Students will gain a greater understanding of the scientific approaches being used to investigate ocean ecosystem health. They will also learn to analyze scientific literature and engage constructively in scholarly discussions.

Prerequisites: Any 200 level science, preference will be given to juniors and seniors who are participating in the Coastal and Marine Sciences certificate program

Notes: Ocean Blues can be applied to any of the course categories required for the certificate.

Instructors: J. Andras

Expected enrollment: 16

BIOI-327-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017

(Spring) Microbiology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

We share planet Earth with an unimaginable number of "invisible" microbial life forms. In this course we will explore the structure, metabolism, genetics, and ecology of microbes, most prominently bacteria. Other microbes, including archaea, eukaryotic microbes, and viruses will also be considered. Whenever possible, the relationship between microbes and humans will be highlighted. Other goals will be for students to become comfortable with scientific primary literature and to hone their communication skills through discussions and written assignments. Finally, the laboratory portion of this course will highlight classic and modern techniques in microbiology.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 230 or both 210 and 220

Instructors: A. Camp

Section Instructors: 01 LAB A Camp | 02 LAB A Camp |

Expected enrollment: 24
BIOL-328-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Human Physiology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A consideration of the physiological processes involved in the control of human body functions. We will study the mechanisms for regulating individual organ systems and how these mechanisms respond to changing needs of the individual. Our examination of the physiological controls will include an analysis of the underlying cellular and molecular processes that drive the mechanisms and integrate the activities of the different systems.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 220 or 230 or Biochemistry 311
Instructors: S. Bacon
Section Instructors: 01 LAB S Bacon | 02 LAB S Bacon |
Expected enrollment: 24

BIOL-331-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Theory and Application of Conservation Biology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course focuses on advanced ecological theory applied to conservation. Class will combine lectures and discussions of primary scientific literature. Labs will include field trips to collect observational and experimental data and indoor exercises to explore the concepts of rarity, coexistence, and population viability with mathematical models. A community-based learning aspect is possible for the final project in this class.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 223 or 315; or Biological Sciences 226 or Environmental Studies 200 and permission of instructor
Instructors: M. Hoopes
Section Instructors: 01 LAB M Hoopes | 02 LAB M Hoopes |
Expected enrollment: 18

BIOL-332-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Macroevolution - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course presents the science of biological form and its relation to adaptation, development, and the modes of evolutionary change. Emphases include primary theoretical literature, whole organisms, and the emerging field of evolutionary developmental biology.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 226
Notes: Biology majors who arrange a lab project in this class can count this course as a lab course.
Instructors: S. Rachootin
Expected enrollment: 12

BIOL-333-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Neurobiology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
We will study the electrical and chemical signals underlying the generation of the nerve impulse and synaptic transmission. We will then explore neuronal circuits underlying learning and memory, movement, and sensory perception.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 200, 220 and 4 credits in chemistry or physics
Notes: preference given to seniors
Instructors: TBD
Section Instructors: 01 LAB TBD | 02 LAB TBD | 03 TBD |
Expected enrollment: 36

BIOL-336-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Bacterial Cell Biology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Long considered to be simple "bags of enzymes," bacteria are now appreciated to be highly ordered and dynamic cells. Bacterial cells organize their genetic material, assemble cytoskeletons, localize proteins, construct organelle-like compartments, differentiate, and communicate with one another to coordinate multicellular behaviors. This course will explore the exciting new field of bacterial cell biology via the primary scientific literature. Substantial student participation in the form of group work and discussions will be expected.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 220
Instructors: A. Camp
Expected enrollment: 12

BIOL-337-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Symbiotic Interactions
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
From mutualism to parasitism, symbiotic interactions are a universal feature of life. In this seminar we will study the mechanisms underlying symbiotic interactions and consider their significance for the ecology and evolution of organisms. Through foundational texts and current scientific literature, we will explore some of the most spectacular and important examples of contemporary symbioses - from coral reefs, to infectious diseases, to the vast communities of microbes that live on and in our bodies - and we will learn how symbiosis is responsible for major milestones in the history of life, such as the origin of the eukaryotic cell, the emergence of land plants, and the evolution of sex.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 223 or Biological Sciences 226
Instructors: J. Andras
Expected enrollment: 16

BIOL-338-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Evolution and Human Sexual Behavior
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This seminar will discuss patterns and variations of human sexual behavior and the likely role that evolution has played in shaping some of these patterns. We will discuss the evolution of sex, gender differences, principles of sexual selection, physiology, cultural differences in sexual behavior, mating systems, etc. We will follow a recently published book on this topic, and add readings from the primary literature. Students are expected to write one major research paper on any aspect of human sexual behavior of their choosing and to be ready to present their findings to the class towards the end of the semester.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 226
Instructors: P. Brennan
Expected enrollment: 12

BIOL-339-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Spring) Mechanisms of Hormone Action
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
What are the molecular mechanisms by which hormones direct cellular processes? In this course, we will examine the nature of chemical communication between and within cells. We will study hormones, receptors, and signal transduction pathways, and the ways in which these signaling systems regulate development, programmed cell death, inflammatory responses, and other biological processes.
Prerequisites: BIOL-230 or both BIOL-210 and 220
Instructors: C. Woodard

BIOL-340-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Eukaryotic Molecular Genetics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this course we will examine the role of molecular genetic analysis in the study of phenomena such as human disease (e.g., breast cancer), animal development, and gene regulation. We will also discuss new techniques for genomic analysis, including the science as well as the health, legal, ethical and moral issues involved. There will be group discussions of original research articles and review articles.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 200 and 210
Instructors: C. Woodard
Expected enrollment: 16

BIOL-395-01 - Biological Sciences - 2016-2017
(Fall) Independent Study
Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, and permission of department; submit application in biological sciences office or via the department's Web site

CHEM-101-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) General Chemistry I
CHEM-110-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Forensic Science - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course will offer an introduction to the science behind forensic investigations. We will explore the role of the forensic scientist, as well as the methods and instruments they use, such as mass spectrometry, infrared spectroscopy and DNA analysis, which are valuable tools in evaluating crime scene evidence. We will examine the validity of scientific findings, how they are evaluated, and the political implications of the use and availability of the data. Students will have a chance to be expert witnesses as they analyze evidence in the lab and report on their findings. Analytical thinking and processing information in chemistry, biology, and other sciences will be emphasized, as well as oral and written communication skills. Short labs are planned.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: T. Breton
Expected enrollment: 16

CHEM-110-04 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Solar Energy: Technology, Policy, and Impact - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar
The way humans use energy has been the driving force behind major social and environmental changes in the 20th and 21st centuries. An understanding of modern energy sources and their impact on society is critical to informed decision-making by citizens and policymakers. This course will introduce students to a broad range of topics related to energy use by focusing on examples related to solar energy. Students will become familiar with the technical concepts behind photovoltaics and solar fuels. We will also explore the economic aspects of energy usage and the policies that are commonly used to encourage renewable energy generation.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: A. Goldstein
Expected enrollment: 16

CHEM-199-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Research
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This seminar is for first-year students who have a strong interest in the chemical sciences and will help to prepare them for scientific research. Students will be exposed to various research topics through reading, discussing, presenting, and writing about primary literature and attending selected department seminars. Throughout the semester students will carry out one research-style project in order to gain experience with the multifaceted nature of scientific inquiry. To jump start their research career on campus, each student will arrange meetings with at least two science faculty followed by a presentation and a written description on the faculty members' research topics.
Prerequisites: FY, Math 101 (prerequisite), Chemistry 201 (co-requisite) and permission by instructor.
Instructors: W. Chen
Expected enrollment: 14

CHEM-212-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Chemistry of Biomolecules
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An examination of the major ideas of biochemistry from the point of view of the chemical sciences rather than the life sciences. Structures of important biomolecules. The role of energetics and reaction dynamics in biochemical processes. Major metabolic pathways are considered, including those of proteins, carbohydrates, lipids, and nucleic acids.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 202
Notes: This course is not intended for Biochemistry majors, who must complete Biochemistry 311 and 314.
Instructors: K. McMenimen

CHEM-223-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Spring) Analytical Chemistry

This course serves as an introduction to quantitative analytical chemistry, with a combined emphasis on both classical analysis tools and fundamental instrumentation for the analytical chemist. Topics to be covered include figures of merit, statistical and error analysis, volumetric and gravimetric titrations, as well as commonly used sample preparation and analyte separation methods. In the laboratory, students will apply techniques covered in lecture to quantitation of analytes commonly seen in pharmaceutical, forensic, chemical and biological settings, as well as learn the fundamentals of method development and optimization.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 201.

CHEM-304-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Spring) Advanced Organic Chemistry Laboratory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This half-semester course, starting after spring break, applies and builds upon the techniques and tools of synthetic organic chemistry acquired during previous laboratory classes. Experiments will be selected to provide exposure to contemporary synthetic methods, to offer examples of the application of sophisticated reagents, to afford practice in modern separation and purification approaches, and provide scope for hands-on acquisition of Nuclear Magnetic Resonance (NMR) spectra.

Prerequisites: Permission of instructor and Chemistry 302 as prerequisite or co-requisite

Notes: second half of semester

Instructors: A. Figueiredo

Expected enrollment: 8

CHEM-308-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Chemical Thermodynamics with Laboratory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

A consideration of the contribution of thermodynamics to the understanding of the "driving forces" for physical chemical changes and the nature of the equilibrium state.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 102/202 and Physics 110 and Chemistry 202 with grade of C or better

Instructors: M. Gomez

Expected enrollment: 30

CHEM-311-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Protein Biochemistry and Cellular Metabolism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is a rigorous introduction to the study of protein molecules and their role as catalysts of the cell. Topics include general principles of protein folding, protein structure-function correlation, enzyme kinetics and mechanism, carbohydrate and lipid biochemistry, and metabolic pathways (catabolic and anabolic) and their interaction and cross-regulation. Biological transformation of energy is considered in light of the principle of thermodynamics.
Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 230 or 210 (can be taken concurrently), and Chemistry 302; Biochemistry majors only
Instructors: K. Berry
Section Instructors: 01 LAB L Lentz-Marino | 02 LAB L Lentz-Marino | 03 LAB L Lentz-Marino |
Expected enrollment: 15

CHEM-316-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Chemical Biology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The field of chemical biology applies chemical perspectives and tools to the study of biological systems. In this course, we will examine the ways that synthetic chemistry has provided techniques that support, complement, and expand on those used in biochemistry, drug discovery, and molecular and cell biology. Topics may include solid phase biomolecule synthesis, combinatorial chemistry, bioconjugation, molecular probes, protein engineering, drug delivery, and synthetic biology.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 302 and any other 300 level chemistry or biochemistry course
Instructors: K. Broaders
Expected enrollment: 16

CHEM-317-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Polymer Chemistry - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An introduction to the study of molecules of high molecular weights with emphasis on synthetic rather than naturally occurring polymers. Topics include polymerization, structures, molecular weight determination, molecular weight distribution, chain configurations, rubber elasticity, and thermodynamics and statistical mechanics of polymer solutions.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 302
Notes: offered once every three years
Instructors: W. Chen
Expected enrollment: 16

CHEM-325-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Atomic and Molecular Structure with Lab - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is an introduction to experimental and theoretical approaches to the determination of the structure of atoms, molecules, and chemical bonds. Classroom work provides background in the theory of atomic and molecular structure and an introduction to quantum mechanics and spectroscopy.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 102/202, Chemistry 202 and Electromagnetism (Physics 201), all with grade of C or better; Mathematics 203 is recommended
Instructors: H. Jayathilake
Section Instructors: 01 LAB H Jayathilake | 02 LAB H Jayathilake |

CHEM-337-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Physical Organic Chemistry - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
An introduction to the concepts and methods of physical organic chemistry. An examination of the mechanistic principles underlying free radical, ionic, pericyclic, and photochemical reactions, and the experimental and theoretical support for mechanistic postulates. Topics will include qualitative molecular orbital concepts, reaction kinetics, thermodynamics, and an introduction to computational methods.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 302
Instructors: G. Snyder
Expected enrollment: 20

CHEM-346-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Fall) Physical Chemistry of Biochemical Systems with Laboratory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an overview of the fundamental principles of physical chemistry with an emphasis on their application to the study of biological molecules and processes. Topics will include quantum mechanics, statistical mechanics and thermodynamics. Discussion of applications will relate commonly used experimental techniques -- such as spectroscopy and calorimetry -- to the fundamental principles on which they are based. In addition, students will gain experience and confidence in the use of mathematical models to describe biochemical systems.
Prerequisites: Math 102/202 and Physics 110 and Chemistry 202 with a grade of C or better
Instructors: A. van Giessen
Section Instructors: 01 LAB H Jayathilake | 02 LAB H Jayathilake | 03 LAB H Jayathilake |

CHEM-399-01 - Chemistry - 2016-2017
(Spring) Comprehensive Seminar - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
A seminar series consisting of meetings on alternate weeks to discuss articles from the current chemical literature. The readings will prepare students for attendance at lectures on the chosen topics in the remaining weeks. The lectures are given primarily by visiting speakers, but they may include department faculty. Students will serve as discussion leaders, and each student will write a paper on a presentation of her choice.
Prerequisites: jr/sr
Notes: Credit/No Credit grading only
Instructors: M. Gomez

CLASS-205-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Cleopatra: "The Not Humble Woman" - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
In this course Cleopatra will be considered both as a political figure of importance in her own right and also as an enemy queen, representing a presumptuous challenge to the political hegemony and cultural values of the Romans. She may serve, therefore, as a lens through which one may view social and political tensions within Roman society over the nature of authority and empire. Readings include Vergil, Horace, Propertius, Lucan, Caesar, Sallust, Plutarch and the plays of Shakespeare and Shaw, where she is ambivalently portrayed as a woman who desires power or, contrariwise, as a romantic idealist who scorns temporal powers in fulfillment of private desires.
Instructors: B. Arnold

(Fall) Gods and Mortals: Ancient Greek and Roman Myth - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
We will accompany Odysseus on his return from Troy, retrieve the Golden Fleece with Jason, and race with Ovid through his witty—and often troubling—retelling of Greek myths from a Roman perspective. This course examines how Greek and Roman authors and artists from very different periods used myth to explore questions about life, art, and politics. Works may include: Homer, Odyssey; Apollonius of Rhodes, Argonautica; Ovid, Metamorphoses and Heroides; Greek tragedy, and ancient images representing myths.
Notes: Open to first-year students.

CLASS-215-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Classical Political Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 211)
Through the works of such thinkers as Aeschylus, Thucydides, Plato, Aristotle, Augustine, Aquinas, Seneca, and Pizan, this course explores the broad themes of ancient and medieval political thought. We will pay particular attention to the ways these writers characterized the relationship between the individual and community; the roles knowledge, reason, emotion, and rhetoric play in political life; the link between gender and citizenship; and the various forms political community can take.
Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr
Instructors: E. Markovits

CLASS-225-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Athenian Democracy and Its Foes - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Democracy first took root in Athens in the late sixth century BCE and flourished, with only brief interruptions, until the city came under the power of Macedon in the latter part of the fourth century BCE. This course will trace the development of Athenian democracy and examine such topics as citizenship; the role of women, the family, and non-citizens in Athens; the legal system; education; and public entertainment. It will also compare democratic Athens with Sparta, its antithesis in the classical period. Sources will include Herodotus, Thucydides, Aristophanes, Plato, Aristotle, Demosthenes, and others.
Instructors: P. Debnar

(Spring) Bread and Circuses: The Politics of Public Entertainment in Ancient Rome - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
"Bread and circuses" (panem et circenses) was a catchphrase in the Roman empire that described the political strategy of controlling an unruly populace through free bread and public entertainment. Against a backdrop of Roman social and political institutions, this course focuses on the imperial ideology, aristocratic ethos, and cultural practices that underpinned this catchphrase, as well as questions concerning the careers of entertainers--gladiators, charioters, and actors--who were at once celebrities and social outcasts; the rules of spectatorship at the games; the use of these games as a form of social control; and the logistics of feeding the city population.
Instructors: G. Sumi
Expected enrollment: 40
CLASS-227-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Ancient Greece
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 227)
This course will trace the emergence and expansion of Greek civilization in the Mediterranean between the Bronze Age and Alexander the Great. Among themes to be explored are political structures, trade, slavery, gender relations, and religion, as well as the contributions of ancient Greeks to literary genres (drama, rhetoric, historiography, philosophy) and to the visual arts. Throughout we will consider how the history of the ancient Greeks can speak to modern concerns. Sources will include works of ancient Greek literature and history (e.g., Homer, Herodotus, Thucydides, Aristophanes, Plutarch) as well as archaeological and epigraphic evidence.
Instructors: P. Debnar

CLASS-228-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Ancient Rome - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 228)
Ancient Rome and its empire can be viewed both as a measure of human achievement and a cautionary tale of the corrupting effects of unbridled power. This course covers the history of Ancient Rome from its mythologized beginnings (753 BCE) to the rise and spread of Christianity under the Emperor Constantine (312 CE). Topics include the creation and development of Rome's republican form of government as well as its eventual transition to monarchy, the causes and consequences of the acquisition of empire, the role of the army in administering the provinces and defending the frontiers, the image of emperor, the economy, and religion.
Notes: Open to first-year students

CLASS-229-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Spring) The Tyrant and Gladiators: Bad Roman Emperors from Caligula to Commodus
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(HIST-229)
Caligula was a god (or so he thought); Nero fiddled while Rome burned; Commodus dressed as a gladiator and fought man and beast in the arena. The history of the Roman empire is replete with scandalous stories about eccentric and even insane emperors whose reigns raise questions about the nature of the emperor's power and his role in administering the empire. In this course a close study of Roman imperial biography and historiography—the source of so many of these stories of bad emperors—will be weighed against documentary and archaeological evidence in order to reveal the dynamic between the emperor, his court, and his subjects that was fundamental to the political culture of imperial Rome.
Instructors: G. Sumi

CLASS-260-01 - Classics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Knowing God - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines the following key texts from the ancient world that treat significantly the problem of knowing God and the mystery enveloping such knowledge: Sophocles' Oedipus the King, Plato's Phaedo, Cicero's Concerning the Nature of the Gods, Job, Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and others. Attention is also given to the different ways of thinking about the divine and human natures in these works, which are broadly reflective of Graeco-Roman and Judeo-Christian value systems.
Instructors: B. Arnold

(Spring) Politics and Greek Tragedy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 329)
Students in this course will explore ancient Greek tragedy as a way of thinking through such central problems of political life as freedom, identity, responsibility, and justice. The course will place the ancient texts in their particular historical context, while also attending to the material as a springboard for confronting contemporary political questions. The course will also address the broader implications of turning to ancient material and to literature as sources for political theorizing.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Politics or Classics
Instructors: E. Markovits
Expected enrollment: 18

(Spring) Socrates Against the Sophists - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 350NT)
In a number of Plato's dialogues we find the character Socrates debating various sophists--itinerant teachers for hire whose views were often diametrically opposed to Socrates' own. This seminar is structured around a close, careful reading of three such dialogues: the Euthydemus, the Protagoras, and the Gorgias. These dialogues will offer a general introduction to Socratic philosophy, but we will also focus on a few issues in much greater detail. Chief among those special topics will be questions about the nature and value of moral knowledge, the possibility of moral education, and the efficacy of the Socratic method of inquiry.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Philosophy or Classics (or in a combination of Philosophy and Classics)
Instructors: D. Hagen

COLL-101-01 - College Courses - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Encountering the Sacred: The Bible and Reading - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Martin Buber famously wrote that we must read the Bible "as though it were something entirely unfamiliar, as though it had not been set before us ready-made." Whether you come to the Bible from within a faith tradition or not, this course will ask you to do just that. We'll take a text that for more than 2,000 years has stood at the heart of the Western tradition and ask how we can approach that text today, from the place where you stand. What does it mean to read a sacred text? How has it been read by people situated both within and at the margins of Western culture? What are the possibilities for your reading?

COLL-101-01 - College Courses - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introductory Seminar: Op-ed: Writing on Politics, Culture, and the Arts - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
We will read and discuss current writing on politics, culture and the arts. Drawn from a variety of print and on-line sources (including The New Yorker, n+1, Arts and Letters Daily, and Bomb), subjects will range from literature, cinema, and art to international politics, crime, and celebrity culture. Using strategies and techniques learned from the readings, students will write essays and articles of their own.

Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: P. Scotto

(Spring) Introductory Seminar: Literature and Politics: The Power of Words - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English)
Literature and politics: what are the connections? How do writers combine their literary and political goals? How does their work impact politics? What literary genres do they employ — utopianism, realism, magic realism, satire, modernism, or postmodernism? How do governments react to literary challenges? We will look closely at the texts themselves, examine the interaction between aesthetics and politics, but also focus on the social and political context. Why was the book written, and in what way did the book impact the politics and ideas of its time? Authors will include Shakespeare, Rousseau, Swift, Dickens, Orwell, Sartre, Andrei Platonov, Solzhenitsyn, Rushdie, and Chinua Achebe.

(Fall) Western Civilization: An Introduction through the Great Books - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Beginning with works emerging from Athens and Jerusalem and proceeding to the modern world, this course will explore the prominent ideas of Western civilization. The course material will be centered on the Great Books from across disciplinary boundaries and will include authors such as Dante, Darwin, Homer, Nietzsche, Plato, Shakespeare and the writers of the Old and New Testaments.
Prerequisites: fy

(Fall) Topics in Leadership: Women, Business, and Leadership Development - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
What does leadership mean and what does it look like? What does it mean to become as leader in a business context? And what does this mean for women? In this half-semester course, we will examine research literature and case examples from various business contexts including small businesses, nonprofits, and larger corporations. Topics will include: leadership capacities, models of leading and managing, effective mentoring and networking, women's career development, and negotiation and influence.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Notes: Half-semester course, October 20 - December 8. No letter-grading (credit/no-credit only). Cannot be repeated if taken in Fall 2012.
Instructors: B. Packard, J. Lansberry

COLL-250-01 - College Courses - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar: War: What Is It Good For? - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
A multidisciplinary examination of the various ways humans have understood, represented, experienced, and justified war over time and across cultures. The course considers the representation of war through art, literature, and music. It analyzes possible causes of war, including innate human drives, gender differences, socialization, and economic and resource competition. In addition, it examines justifications for war from a range of ethical perspectives. Faculty from various disciplines will be asked to guest lecture.

COMSC-100-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) An Introduction to Computer Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An introduction to basic computer science concepts with a focus on Python programming to manipulate images and sounds. Laboratory assignments will provide the main programming opportunities with Python, images, and sounds, while lectures will cover topics such as the origins of computing, computer architecture, artificial intelligence, and robotics.
Notes: students should NOT take this course after Computer Science 101

COMSC-101-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Problem Solving and Object-Oriented Programming
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Computers are used every day for an enormous variety of tasks, from playing games and chatting with friends to transferring billions of dollars, delivering radiation treatments, and controlling the electrical grid. Computer programs are an essential ingredient in allowing for this great diversity of applications. In this course, you will learn to create your own programs, based on core programming concepts and analytical problem solving approaches. You will develop programs involving graphics, animation and games using Java, a very popular modern programming language. We assume no prior study of computer science. Programming intensive.
Prerequisites: 18 Seats open to first - years and 9 open to sophomores. Upon capacity, juniors and seniors may then join the waitlist
Instructors: L. Ballesteros
Section Instructors: 01 LAB L. Ballesteros | 02 LAB L. Ballesteros |

COMSC-103-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Networks - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
How do opinions, fads, and political movements spread through society? What makes food webs and financial markets robust? What are the technological, political, and economic forces at play in online communities? This course examines connections between the social, technological, and natural worlds through the lens of networks. Students will learn basics of graph theory and game theory and apply them to build mathematical models of processes that take place in networks.

COMSC-106-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Scientific Computing - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Have you ever used Google's image search tool and wondered how the search results were found? Why is it so difficult for a computer to "see" as we do? Course material will be framed in the context of computer vision, an active area of research in computer science addressing this general topic. This introduction to scientific computing will use the Python programming language and open source libraries. No prior study of computer science is expected.

COMSC-109-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) iDesign Studio
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Designers are continually innovating ways of incorporating technology into today's world, from projections of butterflies on Grammy performance dresses to "smart" purses that sense when your wallet is missing. The recent emergence of low-cost, user-friendly components is making this new world of design accessible to a broad community. In this course, students will think critically about products already in the marketplace and will be given the tools to create their own designs. A sequence of hands-on workshops on electronics basics and microcontroller programming will provide the surprisingly minimal level of comfort and background in technology required to produce prototypes of these designs.

COMSC-131-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Data Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course will survey the foundational topics of the emerging field of Data Science. This course will introduce the skills, techniques, and tools needed to collect, prepare, analyze, and visualize data to quantitatively ask and answer questions. Through readings, discussions, case studies, and projects, students will explore a breadth of subjects including programming for data manipulation, the presentation and representation of data, statistics and machine learning, "Big Data," and the ethics of working with data at scale.

COMSC-141-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Computing and the Arts
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This introductory course will explore computation as an artistic medium with creative approaches to computer programming as its central theme. We will examine a range of computational art practices through readings, viewings, discussions, labs, projects, critiques, and guest artist/researcher presentations. By combining aspects of a studio art course, a media art survey, and an introductory computing lab, course participants will develop a solid foundation in computer programming approaches and techniques as they pertain to art production as well as an understanding of their emerging importance in the contemporary art world.

COMSC-201-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Advanced Problem-Solving and Object-Oriented Programming
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement

This course builds on the basic programming concepts learned in Computer Science 101. Emphasis is on developing the skills needed to write more sophisticated programs. This includes strategies to aid in assuring the correctness of programs through the use of assertions and unit testing as well as advanced Java features such as inheritance, polymorphism, and network programming. We will also introduce some widely used data structures such as vectors and linked lists. This course is programming-intensive.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 101 with a grade of C or better

COMSC-211-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Data Structures
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Using Java. Solving problems with computers is accomplished by writing programs that operate on data to produce a desired result. The way data is organized and presented to the program can significantly affect its efficiency and simplicity and can sometimes determine whether or not a program can be written to solve the problem at all. This course presents ways of organizing data into "data structures" and analyzes how structuring the data can improve program performance.

(Fall) Software Design - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Building large software systems introduces new challenges to software development. Appropriate design decisions early in the development of large software can make a major difference in developing software that is correct and maintainable. In this course, students will learn techniques and tools to help them address these problems and develop larger software projects, improving their skills in designing, writing, debugging, and testing software.
Topics include design patterns, UML, designing for maintainability, software architecture, and designing concurrent and fault tolerant systems.

(Spring) Topics: Robotics Workshop - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This intermediate-level course will give students hands-on experience designing and developing robots. Not traditionally lecture-based, material will be delivered through an initial set of tutorial-style laboratory sessions. In the first few weeks, students will learn basic hardware components through the use of a microcontroller (e.g., the Arduino Uno). Students will then pitch and develop a robot for the remainder of the semester. A three-dimensional printer is available to produce components for student designs.

(Fall) Theory of Computation - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Are there any limits to what computers can do? Does the answer to this question depend on whether you use a PC or a Mac? Is C more powerful than PASCAL? This seminar explores these questions by investigating several models of computation, illustrating the power and limitations of each of these models, and relating them to computational problems and applications. Topics include finite state automata, pushdown automata, grammars, Turing machines, the Universal Turing Machine, and computability.
Prerequisites: Computer Science 201 and Mathematics 232

COMSC-312-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Algorithms
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
How does Mapquest find the best route between two locations? How do computers help to decode the human genome? At the heart of these and other complex computer applications are nontrivial algorithms. While algorithms must be specialized to an application, there are some standard ways of approaching algorithmic problems that tend to be useful in many applications. Among other topics, we will explore graph algorithms, greedy algorithms, divide-and-conquer, dynamic programming, and network flow. We will learn to recognize when to apply each of these strategies as well as to evaluate the expected runtime costs of the algorithms we design.
Prerequisites: Computer Science 211 and Mathematics 232

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Tired of writing programs that nobody ever uses? Then, this is the course for you. Software enables enterprises to carry out previously tedious or impossible tasks, but many organizations lack the resources to develop needed software. You will apply your programming skills to develop and deliver software to meet the requirements of a client from the community. You will learn critical communication skills required to work with a client, work as a team with classmates, and experience the software lifecycle from requirements elicitation through delivery. You will synthesize many topics learned in courses as well as new technologies required to complete the project. Programming intensive.

COMSC-322-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Operating Systems
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
An introduction to the issues involved in orchestrating the use of computer resources. Topics include operating system evolution, file-handling systems, memory management, virtual memory, resource scheduling, multiprogramming, deadlocks, concurrent processes, protection, and design principles. Course emphasis: understanding the effects of operating system design on computer system performance.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 211 and 221

Artificial Intelligence, as a field, has grown from its humble beginnings in science fiction to become one of the broadest fields in computer science, encompassing an incredibly wide array of topics. One of the common threads between these topics is "How do we build computer systems which exhibit logic and reason?" or rather "How do we build systems which can solve problems intelligently without resorting to brute force?" We'll cover a few major topics in this course, most notably search, logical reasoning, and planning as well as game playing/theory, uncertain reasoning, and graphical models. This course is programming intensive.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 211 and Mathematics 232
Instructors: L. Ballesteros

How does Netflix learn what movies a person likes? How do computers read handwritten addresses on packages, or detect faces in images? Machine learning is the practice of programming computers to learn and improve through experience, and it is becoming pervasive in technology and science. This course will cover the mathematical underpinnings, algorithms, and practices that enable a computer to learn. Topics will include supervised learning, unsupervised learning, evaluation methodology, and Bayesian probabilistic modeling. Students will learn to program in MATLAB or Python and apply course skills to solve real world prediction and pattern recognition problems. Programming Intensive.

COMSC-341-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topic: Computer Security & Privacy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Data security is an everyday concern for people but also for high-profile targets like the United States Director of National Intelligence, the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation, Target and Home Depot. In the course we will study the security vulnerabilities that make attacks possible and actions that can be taken to mitigate them. This course will introduce a variety of security topics: identifying software security vulnerabilities, malicious software, cryptography, authentication, access-control, networking, risk-analysis, usability, and ethics. Students will complete readings, in-class discussions, and hands-on programming activities.

COMSC-341-01 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics: Natural Language Processing
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This seminar provides an introduction to natural language processing, the discipline of getting computers to understand human language. We will cover core ideas and algorithms relevant to both speech processing and text processing, with emphasis on applications in human-computer natural language interaction. Students will design and complete an open-ended final project.

COMSC-341-02 - Computer Science - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics: Building a Digital Library
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Digital libraries could be considered an archetype of many modern systems such as e-commerce websites, music listening services, and even email clients. These systems use information retrieval techniques to find documents and natural language processing to understand texts. Databases are used to store user interactions, and the whole system must be available continuously over the web. This course will focus on understanding and making improvements to the back end of such a system built in Java. Students will work in groups on predetermined 2-3 week projects to get a feel for the various fields and technologies involved. The final few weeks of the course will be for open-ended projects. This course is programming-intensive.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Ever wonder why there are so many semicolons in Java programs, or what it would mean for a language to not be object-oriented? In this course, we will explore issues related to the design and implementation of programming languages. Along the way, we will discover answers to these questions and more. Topics will include syntax, semantics, runtime support for languages as well as an introduction to functional programming.

Critical Social Thought

CST-118-01 - Critical Social Thought - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Political Ideas: Political Freedom
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Politics 118PF)
What is freedom? What makes freedom political? How has political freedom been understood overtime? What are the obstacles on the way to freedom? Is freedom something we even desire? This course will introduce students to the concept of political freedom through diverse readings that include Greek tragedy, modern political thought, the Book of Exodus, Dostoyevsky's Grand Inquisitor, and social science research.

CST-200-01 - Critical Social Thought - 2016-2017
(Spring) Foundations in Critical Social Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
This class introduces students to the interdisciplinary field of Critical Social Thought. Students will learn to interrogate and challenge structures of social, cultural, and political power from a variety of theoretical traditions, such as Marxism, critical ethnic studies, queer and gender critique, critical race theory, media studies, performance studies, disability studies, history of science, the Frankfurt school, and settler colonial and postcolonial theory. Developing skills in theoretical and social critique to address pressing social issues, students will be equipped with an interdisciplinary toolbox to pursue independent projects.

(Fall) Global Movements: Migrations, Refugees and Diasporas
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Geography 208)
The voluntary and involuntary movement of people around the globe is the focus of this course on migrations, refugees, and diasporas. Questions of borders, nativism, transnationalism, the global economy, and legality thread through this course as we consider the many social, cultural, environmental, economic, and political factors shaping decisions to leave a home or homeland. Historical and contemporary case studies, compelling theoretical texts, and geographic perspectives on these topics collectively animate our discussions.

(Spring) United Colors of Neoliberal America - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking-intensive; English 223)
"What can Brown do for you?" This question captures a central theme of this course: how a word like "Brown" evolved from a 1970s signifier of antiracist coalition building into a motto of the United Parcel Service (UPS), selling speed, efficiency, and access to networks of the global economy. Using interdisciplinary methods, we will explore the way multicultural imagery, Civil Rights discourse, and state policy have converged in the service of global capitalism. Focusing on fiction (egs. Octavia Butler, Karen Yamashita), film (egs. Crash, Sleep Dealers) and secondary sources, we will examine the impact of neoliberal multiculturalism and how cultural producers amplify and challenge its logics.

(Spring) Science, Revolution, and Modernity
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 248)
Introduces critical analysis of science and technology by tracing the historiography of the Scientific Revolution. The significance of this extended intellectual episode has been assessed in radically different ways throughout the intervening centuries. As such, it provides a fertile ground on which to pose and answer important questions about science and its role in society. What does it mean to regard science as revolutionary? How are scientific developments shaped by, and how do they shape, the social, economic, and political worlds in which they are embedded? How is our contemporary understanding of science and technology influenced by the stories we tell about the past?

(Fall) Special Topics in Critical Social Thought: Frames of Mind: Tracking Power/Knowledge

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latin American Studies 267FM)

A frame of mind typically refers to a mood or perspective. However, such dispositions also reflect a certain regulation of thought and thus behavior. In other words, something "frames" our minds in the first place. This course explores these ideas by interrogating the history of commonplace assumptions regarding issues such as freedom, race, prison, sexuality, government, and insanity. Authors include Giorgio Agamben, Wendy Brown, Michel Foucault, Friedrich Nietzsche, Edward Said, Ann Laura Stoler, and others.

Prerequisites: The course is geared toward both first-year students with minimal experience with philosophy and other students who have an interest in critical theory.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Latina/o Studies 250YE, Educational Studies 250YE)

This course provides an overview of the immigrant rights movement, emphasizing diverse undocumented Latina/o students throughout the K-20 pipeline. Readings and discussions will: address the socio-political construction of "illegality"; critically examine the creation and implementation of pro- and anti-immigrant legislation, particularly policies that impact undocumented students; survey the challenges and resiliency of the undocumented youth movement as it pertains to education, social mobility, and health; and deconstruct the legislative, political, economic, and cultural factors that impact the undocumented community in the U.S.

(Spring) Topics in Critical Social Thought: Race, Racism, and Power

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Latina/o Studies 250RP)
This course analyzes the concepts of race and racism from an interdisciplinary perspective. Students will be asked to bring a critical lens to the ubiquitous, yet frequently misunderstood concepts of race and racism. We will study the sociocultural, political, economic, and historical forces that collaborate and compete with one another in the production of racial categories. This approach will require us to draw connections between wide-scale processes and everyday interactions. This will involve a consideration of a range of issues and concepts, including colonialism, nation, multiculturalism, representation, and violence. The analysis that we develop will ultimately allow us to think rigorously about social inequality, difference resistance, and liberation.

CST-249-04 - Critical Social Thought - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Critical Social Thought: Cults, Conspiracies, and Moral Panics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(SOCI-216CC)
Using case studies such as the Eugenics Movement, Jonestown, and the Kennedy Assassination, this course will examine how distrust of the government, originally motivated by logical concerns, has transformed the way people think about power in the postmodern era. The class will explore the difference between rational questioning of authority and blind distrust that leads to questionable claims. Through topics such as the War on Drugs, this class shows how the powerful are able to use biases and public fears to carry out their own, often counterproductive, measures. These case studies have issues like race and class at their core. We will examine how certain social issues have managed to endure.

(Spring) Topics in Critical Social Thought: Embodiment in Theory: Precarious Lives from Marx to Butler
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; German Studies 231EM, Gender Studies 204EM)
We examine the writing of major nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first century theorists, such as Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, Dubois, Arendt, Fanon, Foucault, Butler, and others through the lens of embodiment. Rather than read theory as an abstract entity, we explore how theory itself is an embodiment of actual lives in which human beings experience life as precarious. What are the social conditions that create vulnerable bodies? How are these bodies represented by thinkers who lived or are living precarious lives? Through a series of case studies based on contemporary examples of precarity, we examine the legacy and materiality of critical social thought.

(Fall) Critical Race Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Africana Studies 208)
This course examines the discursive relationship between race and law in contemporary U.S. society. Readings examine the ways in which racial bodies are constituted in the cultural and political economy of American society. The main objective is to explore the rules and social practices that govern the relationship of race to gender, nationality, sexuality, and class in U.S. courts and other cultural institutions. Thinkers covered include W.E.B. DuBois, Kimberle Crenshaw, Derrick Bell, and Richard Delgado, among others.

(Spring) Rethinking (Under)Development in Latin America - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Latin American Studies 287DE)
When and how did the notion of "development" emerge and spread? Why does nearly every country now aspire to it? What stigmas and hierarchies does the term "under-development" imply? Throughout Latin America, such terms prove highly problematic not only with respect to the material reality they purport to describe but also as a framework for understanding place, time, and selfhood. In this course, students rethink conventional wisdom about "underdevelopment" through the study of writers, filmmakers, and painters from Latin America working at different historical junctures of the twentieth century.

(Fall) Existentialism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 255)
Does human life have meaning (purpose)? Can religion or spirituality provide it? If not, is human life "absurd"? How can we attain or create meaning in the face of the "absurdity" of human life? What is genuine human freedom? Are other people in the world obstacles to, or also sources for, our attempt to attain or create meaning in our lives? What is existential commitment and "authenticity"? Is existentialist ethics possible at all? We will examine the central themes of existentialism in readings from Kierkegaard, Dostoyevsky, Nietzsche, Sartre, Camus, de Beauvoir, and Fanon (among others). We will also end the course by considering some significant criticisms of existentialism.

An introduction to literary and cultural theory with an emphasis on twentieth century and contemporary thought. We will focus on crucial questions that have focused, and continue to focus, critical debate. These questions may include representation, subjectivity, ideology, identity, difference, gender, sexuality, race, ethnicity, and nation. Throughout we will be particularly interested in the ways in which language and form mediate and construct social experience.

(Spring) The Visual Culture of Protest
(Africana Studies 339, English 339)
This course examines social protests from the perspective of the visual. Examining cultural productions from 1948-2015 we will focus on the geographical specificity of planned and spontaneous protests that have mobilized people into action. We will use a black studies framework to engage the possibilities present in resisting disparate power structures of race, gender, sexuality, class, and region. Artists, musicians, activists, writers, and grassroots organizers of social movements have been ever cognizant of the role of the visual in subverting power structures. We will use this opportunity to place visual culture at the center of a conversation concerning resistance, human rights, political agency, citizenship, and freedom.

(Spring) Advanced Topics: Imperial Neoliberalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(POLIT-307, AFCNA-341NE)
This course is a critical exercise taught at the intersection of two seemingly incommensurable terms, imperialism and neoliberalism. Charting the genealogies of these terms, we will explore the lines of entanglements that hold these two concepts together as mutually reinforcing projects. In part the course will address how self-governance and self-determination under liberal democratic regimes work to accomplish the neoliberal objectives, hence curtailing the legitimacy of the sovereign will as an essential democratic value. This course will also focus on ways neoliberal mandates legitimize the expansion of imperial extractive capacity beyond what physical territorial aggrandizement limited.

(Fall) Advanced Topics: Once More with Feeling: Intimacies and Affects in a Posthuman World
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive; English 382PW)
Affect theory offers a varied and rich critical language to explore how emotion circulates within and among human bodies—and nonhuman ones as well. If emotions operate through bodily changes and chemical exchanges, then animals and nonhumans might similarly be seen as bodies replete with affective materials in motion and at rest. In this course we will read through an array of affect theory from cognitive science, animal studies, and posthumanist debates on the affect of objects. We will consider how humans know what they feel (and when), how animals love, how forests think, and how affects might cross human and nonhuman boundaries.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr; Prior experience with theory is helpful but not necessary.

(Spring) Advanced Topics: Sociology of 9/11 and the War on Terror
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Soci-316WT)
We will explore the cultural and political impact of the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. The media's role in constructing meanings will be a main organizing focus of the course. Using readings, discussions, assignments, and films, the course will allow students to form a picture of how 9/11 changed America and beyond. Course topics include: the way the mainstream media constructed 9/11 and alternate ways they could have; how popular culture and the Public Sphere responded; complex historical factors leading up to 9/11; reasons the attackers say they committed the attacks; ways the event changed culture and politics in the world; conspiracy theories.

(Fall) Advanced Topics: Latinas/os and Housing: Mi Casa is NOT Su Casa
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latina/o Studies 350MC)
Housing is closely tied to quality of life and the health of neighborhoods and communities. This interdisciplinary seminar explores Latinas/os' relationship to housing and home ownership by examining: the history of housing policy in the United States; national identity, assimilation and housing; and discriminatory housing policies/programs and housing inequality. We will explore topics including immigration, housing policy, public housing, segregation, gentrification, the suburbs, and community building. Exploring this range of topics will help us develop a more clear understanding of why housing is one of the most pressing issues for Latinas/os today.
Instructors: V. Rosa

Since the 1960s, many social movements for justice, equality, and inclusion in our world have taken the form of struggles for recognition (e.g., antiracism, feminism, multiculturalism, LGBT activism, etc.). What is recognition in this sense and conversely misrecognition, i.e., the sort of harm or injustice done to someone or certain populations of people by failing or choosing not to recognize them? How can (mis)recognition show up and be theorized both as a matter of how people are socially constituted and how they should treat one another? We will discuss readings (among others) from Rousseau, Hegel, Marx, Hannah Arendt, Iris Young, Charles Taylor, Axel Honneth, Nancy Fraser, and Patchen Markell.

Prerequisites: One prior course at the 200 level in philosophy, politics, sociology, critical social thought, or gender studies. Not open to first-year students.

Instructors: J. Koo

This course examines the intersections of race, disability, illness, and health using literature and culture as primary sites of engagement. Looking to writers like Audre Lorde, Anna Deavere Smith, Mia Mingus, Harriet Jacobs, and Indra Sinha, it asks how structures of racial, environmental, and economic inequity transform the category of disability, which critics have primarily defined in terms of whiteness. It also considers alternate conceptions of health—models that do not align with mandates of productivity or normative embodiment—offered by the texts under consideration, and asks what political/social liberation might look like when able-bodiedness is no longer privileged.

What is Latina Feminism? How does it differ from and/or intersect with other feminisms? This interdisciplinary course explores Latina feminism in relation to methodology and epistemology through a historical lens. We will explore topics related to knowledge production, philosophies of the "self," positionality, the body, and representation. Our approach in this class will employ an interlocking analysis to feminist theory that understands the interconnectedness between multiple forms of oppression, including race, class, sexuality, and ability. Our goal is to develop a robust understanding of how Latina feminist methodologies and epistemologies can be tools for social change.

The medium of cinema has shown persistent concern with war and memory, and has constituted a heated battleground for rememberance and erasure of the past. Through cinema, in other words, we most clearly see both memories of war and subsequent wars among competing memories. The Spanish Civil War (1936-1939), the repressive military regime of Francisco Franco (1939-1975), and recent attempts to "recuperate" memory all dramatize these dynamics and raise a number of larger questions. How do destruction and devastation register through the visual? What happens when we attempt to police memory (through censorship, propaganda, etc.)? What and why do people choose to remember or forget?

There's a low buzz; we feel nervous. Is this capitalism's end? Have zombie silhouettes hit the horizon yet? Keep checking. Anthropology narrates collective feelings, gives form to the ambience. But what's the ambience of late industrialism; what's it feel like to collapse? As we watch factory buildings crumble, we wonder whether the tap water's clean. The question of how to write the world (anthropologically-speaking) must also be a question of how to survive, thrive, and even flourish. Archaeologists have long explored decadence, collapse, and ruins. Cultural anthropologists now find themselves in the archaeologists' shoes. Drawing from archaeology, cultural anthropology, ecology, and literary theory, this course will be an open-ended, writing-oriented examination of contemporary experiences of ruins and ruination.

Dragon ladies, lotus blossoms, geisha girls—the U.S. cultural imaginary is saturated with myths regarding Asian sexuality and gender. This interdisciplinary course intervenes into this dominant imaginary by exploring feminist and queer frameworks derived from Asian-American contexts: immigration, labor, racial stereotyping, militarization, citizenship, and so-called "terrorism." Through a mix of scholarly, creative, activist, and media texts, we will challenge preconceived notions about Asian Americans as regressive, repressed, or hyper-sexual, as well as examine the powerful counter-imaginaries offered within Asian American literature and culture.

Today democracy is seen as the only legitimate regime type, but there is very little consensus about what democracy refers to. This course will explore competing understandings of democracy and its relationship to state institutions and laws. Students will be introduced to contemporary debates over the normative basis of democracy and difficulties of democratic practice and citizenship. Among the questions we will explore are: what is the relationship between liberalism and democracy? Do rights represent the beginning or the end of democratic citizenship? Can democracy exist within a government or does it take form in opposition to it?

After reviewing the classic defense of capitalism as an engine of freedom, progress, and productivity, we will examine major shifts in the critique of capitalism from the early 19th to the early 21st century. This critical conceptual history will range over successive claims that capitalism foments labor exploitation and class inequality, imperialism, instrumentalism, the commodification of culture, the privatization of the commons, and the re-making of subjectivities to suit market imperatives. The course will conclude with Pope Francis's charge that the global capitalist system endangers "whatever is fragile, like the environment" and devours everything "in the way of increased profits." CUSP-100-01 - Curricular Support Courses - 2016-2017
(Spring) Engaging the Pioneer Valley: Community-Based Learning (CBL) Theory and Practice
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
This course will equip students to enter communities effectively and responsibly as learners, researchers, volunteers, and citizens. Successful community-based learning depends on familiarity with communities and methods to study and assess conditions in them, and on familiarity with the history, politics, policies and practices of campus-community partnership. Students will analyze and interact with nonprofit and civic organizations, issues, and leaders to refine personal interests and skills for social justice advocacy. Students will identify and prepare to address critical needs and opportunities via community partnerships through readings, discussions, panel sessions and assignments.
Notes: Note: There is a 12-credit limit on curricular support and non-liberal arts courses that may be counted towards the 128 credits required for graduation.

(Spring) Dance Education: The Power of Dance: Education and Beyond - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Community-based learning course)
This course is designed for students of many fields, including dance, education, and psychology to answer questions such as: How do I access learning and teaching through the medium of the body and movement? How do I teach others how to become change agents through dance? How can I create a program of dance that will challenge and invigorate young people in schools, so that all youth can have access and share their own inspiring movement and culture? How do I work with and master existing educational parameters, standards and frameworks and still stay in touch with the reason I dance, and the reasons people dance and want to dance?
Notes: There will be field trips, teaching opportunities, advocacy experiences, and readings, discussion, studio work, movement and lecture.
Instructors: J. Falk

DANCE-272-01 - Dance - 2016-2017
(Spring) Dance and Culture - *Not offered this year/term
(Theatre Arts 272)
What are the functions that dance serves in society? How does the dancing body signify cultural values? How is dance a vehicle for the articulation of cultural identities? This course attempts to answer these questions from the perspective of dance anthropology and, on occasion, dance history. We will analyze documentaries and texts that illustrate the diverse manners in which dance ethnographers and historians approach the study of dance as a cultural expression. Balancing breadth and depth, the course focuses on a handful of dance forms from North America, Latin America, Africa, Asia, the Middle East, and Europe.
Instructors: C. Salyers

Preamble (for topics courses): This 200-level course investigates a particular topic in economics at some depth without presupposing prior knowledge of economics. Many students may find one or more of these courses useful complements to majors and minors other than economics.

Empirical research has located serious flaws in the concept of rational economic decision making and efficient markets. The evidence indicates that actual decision makers and markets deviate from expected rational outcomes frequently enough to require rethinking of the way decision makers think and markets behave, including unexpected market crashes and sustained market bubbles. This course is designed to examine new theoretical work that seeks to provide more accurate predictions of market behavior, improved assessments of underlying risk to portfolio holders, and better estimates of the underlying value of securities.

(Spring) Economic Development in the Age of Contested Globalization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Why have only few developing countries closed the income gap with industrialized countries? How does globalization affect the prospects for economic transformation and human well-being? How does the rise of China impact the development prospects for other latecomers? We study and discuss how orthodox and heterodox approaches answer these and other questions, and we assess proposed policies and their appropriateness in different contexts. Students have many opportunities to apply the knowledge acquired in class: in debates, simulations, quantitative and qualitative research, and discussions of authentic cases with embedded practitioners from international organizations and the private sector.

ECON-346-01 - Economics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Economic Demography
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Demography is the scientific study of human populations, primarily with respect to their size, structure, and development. This course studies a variety of demographic topics, including fertility, mortality, population age structure, poverty, and inequality. The course also covers empirical econometric techniques that are helpful for answering demographic questions.
Prerequisites: Economics 220
Instructors: J. Norling
Expected enrollment: 19

ECON-349-01 - Economics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Advanced Topics in Economics: Institutional Formation and Development
Economists have long recognized the role of institutions in the development process. Institutions are formal and informal arrangements that govern social interactions. This class is an exploration of how institutions form, how they are sustained, and their consequences for the development process. In the first part of the course, we develop an understanding of simple games used to analyze various social interactions. We then explore how this theoretical apparatus is used in understanding formal and informal institutions governing a variety of social and economic relationships. These relationships will include land ownership, labor, gender relations, and bribery.

Prerequisites: Economics 211 and 212

Instructors: A. Rosete

ECON-349-01 - Economics - 2016-2017

(Spring) Advanced Topics in Economics: Economics of Immigration: Theory, Policy, and History

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement

This course covers the economic theory, policies, and history of immigration. The theory component covers neoclassical models, models from other schools of thought, and contributions from other disciplines. Immigration policy is analyzed through economic models and a political economy perspective. Contemporary arguments for and against open immigration are studied. The course covers the history of ancient migrations, early European migrations to the Western Hemisphere and other colonies, the slave trade, current Hispanic migration, and refugee flows.

Prerequisites: Economics 211 and 212

Instructors: H. Van den Berg

ECON-349-02 - Economics - 2016-2017

(Spring) Advanced Topics in Economics: Social Choice and Welfare

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

This class introduces students to the theory of social choice -- a branch of economic theory that tackles questions of "oughts." How should society choose among several alternatives? What rules constitute a fair method of collective decision-making? Among the topics we will cover are Arrow's and Sen's seminal impossibility theorems, concepts of freedom, individual rights, and opportunities. Throughout, we will make extensive use of examples, prioritizing intuition over mathematical formulation.

Prerequisites: Economics 211 and 212

Instructors: A. Rosete

Expected enrollment: 18

ECON-394-01 - Economics - 2016-2017

(Fall) Senior Seminar for Thesis Students

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course guides thesis students through the thesis process. We will discuss how to do economic research, how to do a research proposal, and how to write a literature review. Students will then complete a proposal and write their own review. Over the course of the semester, they will be matched with advisors in the department and will complete their theses in a section of Economics 395 with their advisor in the spring.

Prerequisites: sr, Economics 211, 212, 220, and one 300-level Economics course

Notes: Thesis students are expected to enroll in this course to begin their thesis. However, we will continue to allow two semesters of 395 to constitute a thesis if appropriate.

(Fall) Self-Awareness in Education
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Educators bring our whole selves when entering educational spaces. With us, we bring lived experiences and social identities as well as expectations, ideals, and emotional reactions to oppression (Adams et al., 2007). Whether implementing a curriculum or policy, this course will assist future educators and policy makers in exploring social identities within their intended roles in education. Frameworks and theories around oppression and liberation will be used for reflection and action related to racism, classism, gender, and adultism.
Notes: Weekly reflections and a final project required.
Instructors: J. Daigle-Matos

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Latina/o Studies 250SP)
This course demystifies college by focusing on three areas: 1) benefits of undergraduate research, 2) how to capitalize on the college experience, and 3) how to prepare for post-baccalaureate opportunities. Specifically, this course will teach students the elements of a research proposal by guiding them with original research. Moreover, students will learn strategies to thrive as undergraduates by exploring interests as means to finding their passion. In addition, this course will decipher the graduate/professional school application process. The overall goal of this course is to encourage and empower students to take their education and pre-professional experience into their own hands and equip them with the necessary tools to be successful.

ENGL-101-101 - English - 2016-2017
(Fall) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Multicultural Families
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Exemption (for topics courses): Though sections of English 101 differ in specific content, all develop the skills of careful reading and effective writing essential to the liberal arts and sciences. Students will write frequently and have an opportunity to revise their work. By active participation in class discussion, students will develop their speaking skills and learn to ask critical questions, formulate answers, and frame persuasive arguments.
This course examines the various ways the multicultural family in contemporary American, British, European, and South African culture is imagined by writers and filmmakers. Issues to be explored include: generational conflict, the struggle to "break away," and the claims of memory and nostalgia. Above all, the course seeks to explore the range of cultural forms in which these themes find expression.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: D. Weber

(Fall) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Black Women Writers
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
In this seminar we will explore various parts of the United States and the Caribbean through analyses of black women's contemporary literature and visual culture. The course will be organized around four themes prevalent in contemporary portrayals of the black female experience in the diaspora. The themes, Body, Voice, Memory, and Movement will allow us to examine notions of agency, representation and counter-narrative. How are narratives of resistance and possession appropriated by black women writers and image-makers and utilized for their own empowerment? What are the penalties inherent when a black woman "comes to voice" in the arena of self-representation?

The finest journalists are professors to the people. They educate citizens so as to facilitate reasoned, fact-based dialogue on subjects as diverse as politics, poverty, war, science, and the arts. We will look at journalism's role in the culture with a particular view to some of the profession's failings and foibles. Students are expected to leave the comfortable confines of the classroom as they try their hand at covering an event, writing a profile, and reporting on an issue of local significance. Throughout the term we will employ the journalistic skills of interviewing, research, and thoughtful analysis to produce snapshots of the world inside and outside the College gates. Curiosity leads. Mastery follows.

This course examines literary representations of worlds and world-making. We will explore how major British authors interpret the idea of the world, as well as how they construct fictional worlds of complexity and beauty. We will consider how the notion of "world" is defined in relation to the cosmos, nature, human society, empire, and travel. A consistent theme will be the depiction of other or new worlds, suggested by places that are remote, abstract, or imaginary. Readings may include Utopia, The Tempest, Paradise Lost, Gulliver's Travels, Robinson Crusoe, and The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

(Fall) Introduction to Journalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course; Writing-intensive)
The finest journalists are professors to the people. They educate citizens so as to facilitate reasoned, fact-based dialogue on subjects as diverse as politics, poverty, war, science, and the arts. We will look at journalism's role in the culture with a particular view to some of the profession's failings and fables. Students are expected to leave the comfortable confines of the classroom as they try their hand at covering an event, writing a profile, and reporting on an issue of local significance. Throughout the term we will employ the journalistic skills of interviewing, research, and thoughtful analysis to produce snapshots of the world inside and outside the College gates. Curiosity leads. Mastery follows.

(Spring) Expository Prose: Making the Argument - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Societies evolve through the exchange of information and ideas. This course explores that exchange as it occurs in contemporary opinion (or op-ed) pieces. Though we begin with Aristotle, most readings will come from the debates of our time. Our aim is to include divergent opinions on a wide array of subjects. Students will team up for close readings, exploring issues of evidence, structure and style. Extensive independent research and considerable rewriting required. This course is intended for students in all disciplines who seek mastery as prose stylists confronting the contentious issues of the day.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Instructors: C. Manegold

ENGL-207-01 - English - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Science Writing: Imagining Illness
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
An exploration of the ways writers from a range of time periods and cultures represent—directly or metaphorically—illness and disease, diagnosis and treatment, suffering and healing. The course considers, as do growing numbers of medical educators and health professionals, the relations between interpretative skills and clinical practice, especially in attending to the stories both patients and texts try to tell. Readings will be selected from works by Berger, Edson, Fadiman, Grealy, Kafka, Lahiri, Lessing, Mann, McEwan, O'Neill, Saramago, Sontag, Sophocles, Williams, and Woolf.

ENGL-214-02 - English - 2016-2017

(Spring) Topics in Medieval Studies: The Curious Middle Ages - *Not offered this year/term

While influenced by Augustine's warning that worldly inquiry could endanger the pilgrimage of the soul, medieval literature contains many instances of curious looking. Exploring the medieval desire to know, this course considers how the period's tendencies toward spiritual and metaphysical thought are balanced against its fascinations with the observable world. We will study the ways allegories, travel narratives, romances, and dream visions intersect with natural philosophy, historiography, cartography, and architecture. Literary analysis is the basis for our investigative work to uncover the epistemological impulses that inform medieval art and literature.

Prerequisites: A first-year seminar; English 210 or English 213 or History 115 or History 232 also recommended.

Notes: Meets English department pre-1700 requirement

We will examine Chaucer’s explorations of love, human will, and various conceptions of closure (in literary terms, the efficacy of complaint, the work of poetic endings, and the poet's accomplishments). These topics will be studied in light of Chaucer's ranging literary influences, especially his assimilation and renovation of classical poetry, French and Italian vernacular verse, romance, saints' lives, allegory, and beast fables. All readings are in Middle English, consisting of a selection of Chaucer's short poems and his major works prior to The Canterbury Tales.

(Spring) Topics in English: British and Irish Fiction 1900-1945

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course examines fiction by some of the key British and Irish writers from the first half of the twentieth century (1900-1945). We will be interested in the ways in which the form and content of the novel and the short story have been impacted by changes in social and cultural contexts. The course will cover topics such as the end of empire and the pervasive influence of music on modernist writers. The reading list will include works by James Joyce, Virginia Woolf, Katherine Mansfield and Elizabeth Bowen.

(Spring) Topics in English: Global English: Its Written and Spoken Forms - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

What is the relationship between language and social and political power? This course is an interdisciplinary study of the global role of the English language. Migration, education, and identity are major themes of the course, and we look at how linguists, policy-makers, and individuals grapple with these complex topics. This course also focuses on students’ development of their written and spoken communication skills and is open to students in all disciplines. Our approach to writing and speaking may be particularly effective for students who do not identify as native speakers of English.

(Spring) Topics in English: Introduction to Latina/o Literatures - Not offered this year/term

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latina/o Studies 212, Gender Studies 204LT)

We will explore a number of readings across different genres (the novel, play, poem, short story, graphic novel). Students will endeavor to understand how each author defines Latinidad. What characterizes Latina/o literature marked by notions of language, nationality, gender, sexuality, class, race, politics, form, and genre? The readings will provide both a survey of general ideas in the study of Latina/o literatures as well as specific case studies and historical examples. The reading list is not meant to be comprehensive but to provide a sampling of texts.

(Spring) Topics in English: Queer and Trans Writing

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Writing-intensive; GNDST-204QT)

What do we mean when we say "queer writing" or "trans writing"? Are we talking about writing by queer and/or trans authors? Writing about queer or trans practices, identities, experience? Writing that subverts conventional forms? All of the above? In this course, we will engage these questions not theoretically but through praxis. We will read fiction, poetry, comics, creative nonfiction, and hybrid forms. Expect to encounter work that challenges you in terms of form and content. Some writers we may read include Ryka Aoki, James Baldwin, Tom Cho, Samuel R. Delany, kari edwards, Elisha Lim, Audre Lorde, Cherríe Moraga, Eileen Myles, and David Wojnarowicz.

(Spring) United Colors of Neoliberal America - *Not offered this year/term

(Speaking-intensive; Critical Social Thought 223)

"What can Brown do for you?" This question captures a central theme of this course: how a word like "Brown" evolved from a 1970s signifier of antiracist coalition building into a motto of the United Parcel Service (UPS), selling speed, efficiency, and access to networks of the global economy. Using interdisciplinary methods, we will explore the way multicultural imagery, Civil Rights discourse, and state policy have converged in the service of global capitalism. Focusing on fiction (e.g., Octavia Butler, Karen Yamashita), film (e.g., Crash, Sleep Dealer) and secondary sources, we will examine the impact of neoliberal multiculturalism and how cultural producers amplify and challenge its logics.

(Fall) British Romanticism: Revolution and Reaction

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This class will examine the ways Romantic-era writers figured revolution and the reaction against it, in the wake of the French Revolution's spectacular but failed promises of liberty, fraternity, and equality for all. We will pay special attention to how British writers envisioned their own versions of freedom and equality, extending them to women, slaves, and the poor. Likewise we will explore how this project for social change was necessarily related to revolutions in language and aesthetics. Authors may include Burke, Wollstonecraft, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Smith, Barbauld, Blake, Austen, Keats, Percy and Mary Shelley, Byron, and Hemans.

(Fall) American Drama, 1787 to present

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Theatre Arts 234AD)

This course offers a broad survey of American drama in the context of performance traditions such as minstrelsy, melodrama, realism, the Broadway musical, and the avant-garde. We read works that challenge and expand concepts of national identity and their connection to discourses of race, class, ethnicity, and gender. How do the characters and landscapes of these plays reflect historical events and theatrical inventions? What do they tell us about what it means to be an "American," and how have our answers changed over time? Playwrights will include Tyker, Baker, Aiken, Brown, Boucicault, O'Neill, Stein, Hurston, Treadwell, Wilder, Williams, Miller, Shepard, Kennedy, Wilson, Mamer, Hwang, Kushner, Parks, Ruhl, and Jacobs-Jenkins.

(Fall) Modern British Poetry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This introduction to modern British poetry pays special attention to the emergence, consolidation, and dismantling of modernist poetry and poetics. It will link this literary history with, amongst other things, the loss of faith, the two world wars, and the relationship between monumental aesthetics, utopian poetics, and totalitarian politics. Writers will include Hardy, Yeats, Eliot, H.D., and Auden.

(Spring) Modern Irish Literature - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course will introduce students to the literature of modern Ireland beginning with Swift, moving through the nineteenth century, examining the Irish Literary Revival and Irish modernism, and finally contemporary drama, poetry, and fiction. We will focus on Irish women writers and their literary interventions concerning colonial history, nationalism, and Unionism. We will pay particular attention to representations of Irishness, the relationship between literature and national history, and questions of violence and representation. The course will explore how the genres, styles, and forms of Irish writing are determined by the experience of colonial trauma and the imperative to imagine national identity.

(Fall) Novels of the Later Eighteenth Century: Worthy Hearts and Saucy Wits - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 204WH)
Eighteenth-century England witnessed the birth of the novel, a genre that in its formative years was both lauded for its originality and condemned as intellectually and morally dangerous, especially for young women. We will trace the numerous prose genres that influenced early novelists, including conduct manuals, epistolary writing, conversion narratives, travelogues, romance, and the gothic. In doing so, we will concomitantly examine the novel's immense formal experimentation alongside debates about developing notions of gender and class as well as the feeling, thinking individual. Authors may include Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Walpole, Burney, and others.

(Spring) Contemporary African American Literature II
(Africana Studies 251)
This course will examine African American literature and culture in the postwar period as American identities are coalescing around the concept of the US as a world power. Specifically, our task during the semester will be to discuss the myriad ways black authors and artists attempt to interrogate the structure of racial hegemony by creating poetry and prose meant to expand notions of culture and form. We will also examine music, visual art, and advertisements from this era to have a greater sense of the black experience through various cultural representations. Writers will include James Baldwin, Toni Morrison, Ralph Ellison, Michael S. Harper and bell hooks.

(Spring) Mapping Jewish American Generations
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Jewish Studies 276)
This course sets canonical Jewish American literature in creative dialogue with contemporary Jewish American writers, filmmakers, and performance artists to explore how early twentieth-century figures (Abraham Cahan, Anzia Yezierska, and Henry Roth) continue to influence --inspire--a rising generation of authors. The key mediating figure in this generational dialogue is Philip Roth, whose work we will examine as well. Topics to be explored include "immigrant" writing then and now; the uses of nostalgia; genealogies of standup comedy and popular culture in general; the emergence of "hipster" Judaism and its various modes of expression (above all via social media).
Prerequisites: 4 credits in English, religion, Jewish studies, history, sociology, film studies
Instructors: D. Weber

ENGL-300-01 - English - 2016-2017
(Fall) Writing Historical Fiction - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Does historical fiction offer readers something history books cannot? What obligation does the writer of historical fiction have to the verifiable facts of the past? Is history a place we can visit, or is it a living force, defining the present? Isn't there a sense in which all fiction is historical fiction? In this course we'll consider these and other questions as we read and write historical fiction. We'll go out with our shovels and teaspoons to dig in the past, unearthing the psychological atmosphere, the gossip, the voices, and the important lies that will show us the way to breathe new life into the cold, dead facts of history.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, English 203, and permission of instructor; online application required

(Fall) Studies in Journalism: Science Writing - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This class is designed to immerse students in some of the most extraordinary science writing published today. Drawing from magazines, the web, and longer works such as "Five Days at Memorial," "Tom’s River" and "The Sixth Extinction," we will closely examine how writers bring complex scientific material to life for the general reader. Students will be coached through a series of writing challenges culminating in the production of one magazine-length work. Throughout, we will focus on clarity of expression, felicity of style, the delivery of complex facts and concepts in accessible language, and the building of narrative.

(Spring) Studies in Journalism: Magazine Writing - Sequence I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Community-based learning course; Writing-intensive)
Students in this class will produce original works at magazine length. Assignments will get them out of the classroom and into the world, exploring feature stories and local issues of importance. A student's mastery of her chosen topic will rest on personal observation, extensive interviews, and deep research. All pieces produced will go through multiple drafts. Readings are designed to shape classroom discussion and lend inspiration. These will include classics of the genre, as well as material from current issues of the New Yorker, Slate, Atlantic Monthly, Vanity Fair, the New York Times Sunday Magazine, and other publications.
Prerequisites: Intro to Journalism, Intro to Creative Writing, or Narrative Non-fiction
Notes: meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: C. Manegold
Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-301-02 - English - 2016-2017
(Fall) Studies in Journalism: Narrative Nonfiction - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Exceptional works of nonfiction will guide us as we weigh the challenges of building energetic narratives out of small mountains of facts. Story development, research, structure, "voice," and the translation of specialized language into accessible prose will be our focus throughout. Students will read widely, dipping into the best work now in print; yet the core endeavor will be to produce two original works of nonfiction at magazine length. Workshops, peer-edits and individual meetings will help students move toward powerful writing aimed to shape --and perhaps even reshape - readers' understanding of a corner of the world.

(Spring) Advanced Journalism: Journalism History & Ethics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Can a story be accurate but false? Should reporters value protecting national security over telling the truth? Is it ethical to tell a lie if it allows access to important information? Journalists face difficult ethical dilemmas every day. But how do they know what to do? Are there rules? In this class we will study ethics in journalism from the time of the muckrakers to the rise of the blog.

(Fall) Contemporary Women's Short Fiction - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
In this course we will read and discuss short stories written by living masters of the form. We will not speculate about the meaning of the work or the author's intent, rather we will read as writers, noting and comparing each author's decisions about voice, diction, syntax, image, metaphor, and tone that, within the narrow confines of this challenging form, bring a world into being. In addition students will undertake various exercises culminating in a short story of their own. Class presentations, short papers, and original fiction constitute the graded material for this course. Authors will include Margaret Atwood, Andrea Barrett, Sabina Murray, Andrea Lee and Jhumpa Lahiri.
Prerequisites: jr, sr and 8 credits in department
Notes: meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: V. Martin

ENGL-311-01 - English - 2016-2017
(Fall) Chaucer: The Canterbury Tales
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Known as a storyteller par excellence, Chaucer was also a famous reader of classical epic, romance, and philosophy. This research seminar will give students the opportunity to read the Canterbury Tales in light of the work's cultural, historical, and literary contexts. Throughout the semester, students will engage with Chaucer's tales and his favorite sources to examine and discuss his representations of gender and class, his perspectives on religious authority, his use of the English vernacular, and his commitment to poetry.
Prerequisites: English 200/199; English 210 or 213 recommended
Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

(Fall) Studies in Renaissance Literature: Trauma in the Premodern World - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
When told that his wife's madness cannot be cured, Macbeth asks: "Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?" Although the term "trauma" was not used to describe a psychological state until the nineteenth century, Macbeth's query suggests that premodern subjects both understood and experienced the sorts of psychic injury the term denotes. This course will explore how trauma was discerned, expressed and represented in premodern European culture. Readings will include contemporary theoretical explorations of trauma, as well as works by Shakespeare, Marlowe, Aphra Behn, and Daniel Defoe.
Prerequisites: English 200/199; English 210 or 211
Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

ENGL-317-01 - English - 2016-2017
(Spring) Studies in Renaissance Literature: Early Modern Drama
"All the world's a stage." This course surveys the era of literary history that invented this powerful idea. The drama of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is obsessively self-conscious, bursting with disguises, confidence tricks, cross-dressers, masques, and plays-within-plays. Reading several playwrights, we will situate Shakespeare among his rivals and peers: Marlowe, Jonson, Webster, and others. More generally, we will explore early modern notions of performance and theatricality, considering how they were entwined in conceptions of desire, evil, gender, and politics.

Prerequisites: English 200/199 and either English 210, 211, or 212
Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement
Instructors: S. Roychoudhury

(Spring) Gender and Class in the Victorian Novel - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333SS)
This course will investigate how representations of gender and class serve as a structuring principle in the development of the genre of the Victorian novel in Britain. We will devote significant attention to the construction of Victorian femininity and masculinity in relation to class identity, marriage as a sexual contract, and the gendering of labor. The texts chosen for this course also reveal how gender and class are constructed in relation to other axes of identity in the period, such as race, sexuality, and national character. Novelists will include Dickens, Eliot, Gaskell, C. Bronte, and Hardy. Supplementary readings in literary criticism and theory.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department including English 220

ENGL-328-01 - English - 2016-2017
(Fall) T. S. Eliot, Virginia Woolf, and Modernism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will chart the development of Modernism in poetry and prose by examining the careers of two of the most important writers in the first half of the twentieth-century: the poet, T. S. Eliot and the novelist, Virginia Woolf. We will focus on the way both writers initially seek to wrestle into representation new content within the frame of pre-existing forms and, by so doing, discover that these forms are inadequate or buckle under the strain and need to be revised, renewed, and transformed.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in English
Instructors: N. Alderman

ENGL-329-01 - English - 2016-2017
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
This course explores how London has emerged as a rich site of literature and popular culture, a multicultural contact zone drawing writers and filmmakers to the metropolitan center of the former imperial Empire. It focuses on Britain's more recent experience of migration, displacement, and transplantation. The course examines how contemporary writers investigate the meaning of "Englishness," along with their own vexed relation to British history and identity. Authors include Sam Selvon, V.S. Naipaul, Salman Rushdie, Hanif Kureishi, Andrea Levy, Zadie Smith, Caryl Phillips, and Neel Mukherjee. Films include My Beautiful Laundrette, My Son the Fanatic, and Anita and Me.

(Spring) Asian American Film and Visual Culture: Beyond Geishas and Kung Fu Masters
(Speaking-intensive; Film Studies 320BG)
This course examines contemporary Asian American film and visual culture through the lens of cultural recovery, self-invention, and experimentation. Focusing primarily on film and photography, we will explore issues of race and visuality, Hollywood orientalism, memory and postmemory, and racial impersonation and parody. Students will engage with a variety of theoretical and critical approaches. Artists may include Nikki S. Lee, Margaret Cho, Tseng Kwong Chi, Jin-me Yoon, Justin Lin, Binh Dahn, Richard Fung, Mira Nair, Deepa Mehta, and Alice Wu.

(Spring) The Visual Culture of Protest
(Africana Studies 339, CST 339)
This course examines social protests from the perspective of the visual. Examining cultural productions from 1948-2015 we will focus on the geographical specificity of planned and spontaneous protests that have mobilized people into action. We will use a black studies framework to engage the possibilities present in resisting disparate power structures of race, gender, sexuality, class, and region. Artists, musicians, activists, writers, and grassroots organizers of social movements have been ever cognizant of the role of the visual in subverting power structures. We will use this opportunity to place visual culture at the center of a conversation concerning resistance, human rights, political agency, citizenship, and freedom.

(Spring) Modern Urban British Novel - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
As London and the British novel enter the new millennium, both are sites of competing histories, traditions, and agendas. This course will map the city’s progress from the center of an empire to a node in the global world’s economy, and chart the twentieth-century novel’s movement from realism to postmodernism and beyond. Beginning by contrasting the realist London of Conan Doyle’s Sherlock Holmes with Virginia Woolf’s modernist version in Mrs. Dalloway, we will go on to trace the development of the post-1945 British novel.
Prerequisites: jr, sr; 8 credits in department including English 200

(Spring) Cosmopolitanism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
"Nothing human can be alien to me." Taking its cue from Terence's maxim, and focusing on works of contemporary transnational literature, this seminar explores the idea of "cosmopolitanism." Can there be such a thing as global citizenship, a set of values or commitments that transcend local particulars and instead emphasize universality? How does cosmopolitanism square with nationhood and global mobility? What in particular constitutes literary cosmopolitanism? To find our way through these questions, we will read fiction and non-fiction from the Caribbean, Africa, South Asia, and East Asia, as well as philosophical and theoretical texts. Authors may include Achebe, Naipaul, Coetzee, and Desai.

(Fall) Topics in African American Literature: Toni Morrison
(Africana Studies 341TM)
This course will examine the work and the centralized black world of the last American Nobel laureate in literature, Toni Morrison. Morrison is the author of eleven novels and multiple other works, including nonfiction and criticism. In a career that has spanned over forty years and has informed countless artists and writers, Morrison's expansive cultural reach can hardly be measured accurately. In this course we will endeavor to critically analyze the arc and the import of many of Morrison's writings. Readings include: The Bluest Eye, Sula, Song of Solomon, Jazz, Playing in the Dark, Paradise, and A Mercy.

(Fall) Sex, Race, and the Visual - *Not offered this year/term
(Africana Studies 351)
This course examines categories of race, gender, sex, and sexuality through the lens of the visual. Using contemporary literature, photography, performance art, film, and theories of the visual, our task is to investigate the import and utility of embodiment. How do race, gender, and sexuality function in the artistic imaginary? What can we glean from cultural productions that engage the viewer/reader in ways that challenge ideas about conformity, fluidity, belonging, and self-reflection? More than a linear literary or theoretical trajectory, this course will provide a template for all the mechanisms of the visual—psychological and ocular, interpretive, rhetorical and performative.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333DH)
This course will explore visual and literary images of nineteenth through early twentieth-century marriage and motherhood. Discussion of Virginia Woolf's "A Room of One's Own" and Barbara Welter's essay "The Cult of True Womanhood" will serve as the springboard for our focus on representations of women in the home. We will incorporate a visit to the art museum, and will analyze film adaptations of some of the texts we read. The course will focus primarily on American literature, film, and art, with the exception of Ibsen's A Doll's House; selected written texts will include works by writers such as Hawthorne, James, Stowe, Gilman, Freeman, Chopin, Harston, and Wharton.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits from the department

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333MM, Environmental Studies 373WN)
This course will focus on portrayals of women in nineteenth through mid-twentieth century America, particularly in the context of nature and landscape. We will explore how women, often objectified in visual images of the period, appropriated established devices or developed new images and structures to represent womanhood in their own terms. Texts will include selected poetry, sketches, autobiographical essays or memoirs, short stories, novels, paintings, films, and photography.

(Spring) Hitchcock and After
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 380HA)
This course will examine the films of Alfred Hitchcock and the afterlife of Hitchcock in contemporary U.S. culture. We will interpret Hitchcock films in a variety of theoretical frames, including feminist and queer theories, and in shifting historical contexts, including the Cold War. We will also devote substantial attention to the legacy of Hitchcock in remakes, imitations, and parodies. Hitchcock films may include Spellbound, Strangers on a Train, Rear Window, Vertigo, North by Northwest, Psycho, The Man Who Knew Too Much, Mann, and The Birds; additional works by Brooks, Craven, and De Palma. Readings in film and cultural theory; screenings at least weekly.

ENGL-382-01 - English - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics: Once More with Feeling: Intimacies and Affects in a Posthuman World
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive; Critical Social Thought 349PW)
Affect theory offers a varied and rich critical language to explore how emotion circulates within and among human bodies—and nonhuman ones as well. If emotions operate through bodily changes and chemical exchanges, then animals and nonhumans might similarly be seen as bodies replete with affective materials in motion and at rest. In this course we will read through an array of affect theory from cognitive science, animal studies, and posthumanist debates on the affect of objects. We will consider how humans know what they feel (and when), how animals love, how forests think, and how affects might cross human and nonhuman boundaries.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr; Prior experience with theory is helpful but not necessary.
Instructors: K. Singer

(Spring) Reading James Joyce
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will include all of James Joyce's major works: Dubliners, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, Ulysses, and Finnegans Wake (extracts). Students will be encouraged to explore the oral, interpretative, performative, and musical aspects of Joyce's writing. The texts will be explored in the context of politics and colonialism, and will be contextualized through discussions of modernism, postmodernism, and the Irish literary tradition.

(Fall) Topics in English: Music and the Irish Novel
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Music and the Irish Novel introduces students to Irish novelists from the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. In these novels music plays a significant role, as a thematic, formal, or aesthetic inspiration. Traditional, opera, ballads, jazz, classical, pop, and contemporary music; all play a role in this literature. What do we mean when we say that a language, or a piece of literature, is "musical"? Why do writers of contemporary historical fiction favor musical references? This intertextual link will lead to inquiries into the role of music in prose fiction, and in particular in the Irish novel.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
In this foundation course, the class will select and confront four major problems from a list of possible subjects such as aging, health care, education, food and housing security, employment, poverty, sustainability and environmental health, and crime. Students will then gain ability to analyze those problems, assess the opportunities for solutions that emerge, design initial solutions, and configure organizations that allow for the implementation of those solutions. The course will utilize texts, short lectures and discussions, video, guest presentations, in-class ideation exercises, and development of analytical skills.

(Spring) Ethics in Entrepreneurship and Business
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 260EB)
What are the special challenges of obligation and responsibility that individuals, businesses and other organizations face in a complex global environment? We explore these questions using applied philosophical ethics from the traditional approaches to moral philosophy (studying the ethical character of both actions themselves and the results of those actions) and the more recent ethics of care. We apply these ethical considerations in different cases and contexts of individual decision-making and the choices and dilemmas that businesses and other organizations face.

(Fall) Topic: Is Business Moral?
Is engaging in business a moral activity? Is virtuous business activity that which is inherently virtuous or that which benefits society? Are there moral obligations surrounding how workers are treated? Is the ability of business to elevate our material standard of living a good thing? Through reading the Great Books of Western Civilization, we will look at what philosophers and novelists argued about business ethics starting with Athens and Jerusalem, proceeding through the English Financial Revolution, the Industrial Revolution, the Gilded Age, the Progressive Era, and into contemporary society. Authors will include Aquinas, Mandeville, Dickens, Thoreau, Dreiser, Shaw, and Wolfe.

(Spring) Topic: Sociology of Organizations
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(SOCI-316RG)
Sociology of Organizations introduces concepts of institution, organization, network, role and system. These ideas are at the heart of the classical sociological enterprise. They open up questions of social scale and social context by drawing attention to the level of action between individuals and abstract global systems. Using case studies, students will engage the question of ethical action in a complex world marked by competing rationalities. Using resources from class readings, students will be asked to research an organization of which they are a member to develop their own case study.

ENVST-104-01 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Renewable Energy
We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.

ENVST-200-01 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Environmental Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Most of the environmental challenges we face are complex and interdisciplinary in nature. This course introduces students to the scientific principles, concepts, and methodologies required to both understand the interrelationships of the natural world, as well as to identify and analyze environmental problems and think critically about alternative solutions for addressing them. Key concepts from ecology, biogeochemistry, and other scientific fields inform our study of climate change, water resources, soil sustainability, food production, and other topics. Fundamental and emerging issues are examined using regional case studies, hands-on problem solving, and field and laboratory experiments.
Prerequisites: One 100-level lab science; one course in statistics is recommended
Instructors: J. Albertine
Section Instructors: 01 LAB K. Ballantine | 02 LAB K. Ballantine |
Expected enrollment: 24

ENVST-210-01 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Political Ecology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This course will explore the historical, political, economic, social, and cultural contexts in which human-environment interactions occur. We will cover critical topics and trends in the field of political ecology, from its early manifestations to more recent expansions. Using case studies from the global south and north, we will discuss factors that shape social and environmental change across scales from the personal to the global, and we will examine the role of gender, race, class, and power in struggles over resources. Students will become familiar with the academic debates in which political ecologists are engaged, and they will apply the concepts discussed in a case of their choice.

ENVST-233-01 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Environmental Studies: Environmental Ethics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 260ET)
A fundamental problem we face as humans is how we should relate to the natural world. Why not turn Yosemite into a parking lot? Should we control nature by applying scientific and technological expertise? Or should we strive for noninterference and preservation of the wild? How do we balance the pressing needs of people for food, energy, and other resources with the needs of other species or whole ecosystems?

(Spring) Native American History through 1865
(History 235)
This course surveys Native American history from ancient times through the U.S. Civil War, tracing the ways that tribal communities have shaped North America. Beginning with the diverse indigenous societies that inhabited the Americas millennia before Columbus's arrival, it discusses the cultural complexity of Native peoples, nations, and worldviews rooted in particular ecosystems and homelands. It moves through the early modern era of European scientific exploration and "discovery" of a New World, and the pivotal violences of the "Indian Wars" of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and early nineteenth centuries.

ENVST-240-01 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) The Value of Nature
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Through this seminar, students develop an in-depth knowledge of and articulate vocabulary for the significant and diverse ways that humans value the natural world - utilitarian, scientific, aesthetic, naturalistic, symbolic, ethical, and spiritual. We use these different typologies of human environmental values as frameworks for readings and discussion, extending our examination to historical and cultural variations in values, competing perspectives of the natural world, and other value concepts, including intrinsic and transformative value. We examine the concept of biophilia and probe the role values play in the concern over losses of biological diversity and its implications.
Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 100
Notes: gateway course for minor in conceptual foundations of science
Instructors: T. Farnham

(Fall) Environmental Issues - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this course, we will explore the different facets of numerous environmental policy issues and review the substantive aspects, legal themes, and regulatory structure of the major federal environmental laws. The laws covered in this course include the National Environmental Policy Act, the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Endangered Species Act, and others. The course objectives are for the student to learn the basic regulatory characteristics of the major laws and to become well-versed in the current environmental issues which we will focus upon throughout the semester, such as global climate change, ocean degradation, energy resources, and biodiversity loss.

(Spring) Place and Power in the American West and Pacific World
(History 271)
The vast region of North America between the Mississippi River and Pacific Ocean has been a site of many migrations, conflicts, political transformations, and environmental changes. This course examines dynamic histories of Native American tribes, Euro-American "explorers" and colonists, cowboys and miners, Asian immigrant laborers, and mariners, all of whom helped create interior and oceanic worlds. It focuses on natural and human changes in specific locales, and also explores how public histories at these places shape the present and future.

(Fall) History of Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-and writing-intensive; History 301HE)
We live in an age of energy crises, in which the future of energy is questioned in countless headlines and Twitter feeds. Often our energy agony accompanies other assumptions about energy’s past, in particular the idea that social change invariably follows the discovery of new energy technologies. From food to fuel cells, this colloquium charts a more complicated and interesting history, a history in which people have continually shaped and made meaningful the energies that fuel the modern world. It will be of particular interest to students in history and environmental studies and to those interested in the social study of science and technology.

(Fall) Research, Ethics and Policy in Environmental Studies - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Designed to promote curriculum-to-career, this hands-on course prepares students for independent research, research internships, or research careers. Student pick topics of interest and share weekly assignments. Over the course of the semester, we examine methods for designing research and for gathering and analyzing information, and we discuss using data to inform policy. We speak with Mount Holyoke alumnai who have conducted research during internships, for honors theses and independent study, or for policy institutes after graduating. Finally, we consider ethical issues, from gendered experiences to cross-cultural research, and students prepare institutional review board proposals. Students from various disciplines are welcome.
Prerequisites: 8 credits of 200 level social science or humanities courses. Meets the ES politics and policy, environment and development, and conservation concentration requirements.

(Spring) Restoration Ecology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Community-based learning course)
A key test of our ecological knowledge is whether we can successfully apply it to create or restore ecosystems that have been damaged or destroyed. As we take on the role of restoration ecologists this semester, we will use principles and methods of ecology, conservation biology, hydrology, soil science, and related disciplines to learn about the theory, practice, and politics of ecosystem restoration. This course emphasizes fieldwork, interdisciplinary teamwork, and ecological planning to evaluate and design restoration projects in our surrounding communities and regional landscapes. On a few occasions, meetings may last until 5:05 pm so that we can go on fieldtrips that are farther from campus.
Prerequisites: Environmental Science 200, at least 8 credits of 200 or 300-level laboratory science

(Fall) Perspectives on American Environmental History - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; History 317)
We explore the history of human-environment interactions in North America from precolonial times to the present from different cultural perspectives. How have such human activities as migration, colonization, and resource use depended on or modified the natural world? How have different cultural perceptions of and attitudes toward environment shifted through time and helped to reshape American landscapes? Case studies include ecological histories of Native America and Euro-America, slavery and land use, wilderness and conservation, and environmental racism and social justice. Our approach entails historical review of scientific studies, literature, visual records, and oral tradition.

ENVST-321-01 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Conference Course: The Challenges of Feeding Nine Billion People
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Human population is expected to surpass 9 billion in the next century. As our population grows, so will our need for food. Land available to grow food will not increase and degrading environmental conditions will make adequate food production on this land increasingly difficult. We will focus on the challenges to meet the nutritional needs of a growing population as well as look at some of the possible solutions for the future from a scientific standpoint. These challenges/solutions will be investigated at both the world and local (northeast US) scales. In addition to being a heavily science-based class on food security, we will also address issues of food justice and environmental justice.
Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 200, or other 200 level Biological or Plant Science class
Instructors: J. Albertine
Expected enrollment: 18

ENVST-321-02 - Environmental Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conference Courses in Environmental Studies: Political Economy of the Environment: Capitalism and Climate Change
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Can an economic system predicated on infinite growth achieve sustainability on a finite planet? This question will likely define the twenty-first century. This course aims to grapple with this paradox, examining the relationships and tensions between the globally dominant form of economy - capitalism - and global climate change. We will explore the interwoven rise of capitalism and emergence of fossil fuel energy, as well as the global expansion of capitalism and the connections between resources, economic growth, and political power. We will engage with various theoretical approaches to capitalism-environment relations, such as metabolic rift theory, the second contradiction of capitalism, and the production of nature thesis. These theories provide insight into recent forms of capitalism (i.e. neoliberalism) and the increasing degradation and commodification of the environment. We end by studying contemporary debates, examining institutions and policies seeking to manage climate change.

(Spring) Landscape and Narrative - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Different stories or narratives—whether myth, literature, maps, or scientific theory—have been created about every region or environment on Earth as human attempts to describe and understand our connections with that place. How do braided strands of human history and natural history contribute to stories we tell of the land, and to stories we tell of ourselves in the land and of relational identity? In this reading and writing seminar we will reflect on how lifeways, homeplace, and identity of an individual or a community are linked with environment or the land. We will also create written and visual narratives of our own and explore creative environmental writing in reflection and action.

(Spring) Wetlands Ecology and Management
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Although they cover ~0.6% of the earth’s surface, wetlands perform more ecosystem services per hectare than any other ecosystem type. Alarmingly, over half of the earth’s wetlands have been lost to agriculture and development. With these wetlands were also lost the valuable ecosystem functions wetlands perform. This course takes an interdisciplinary approach to examine the biogeochemical, ecological, societal, and regulatory aspects of wetland ecosystems. Group discussion of primary scientific literature, as well as independent experimental design and the writing of a research proposal are core components. Field trips will sometimes keep us until 5:05 pm, and will provide an opportunity to explore these fascinating ecosystems in person.

(Spring) Interdisciplinary Perspectives on Environment and Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course will engage students in interdisciplinary thinking about the dynamic relationship between environment and development. Focusing on specific case studies, we will consider complementary and contrasting perspectives about the causes of and solutions to global poverty and environmental degradation. We will examine how development theories and practices have changed over time, and we will reflect on how our assumptions shape what we “see” in specific sites, how we frame particular problems and what we suggest as solutions. The course is designed as a curriculum-to-career course in which students build practical skills for international development careers.

(Fall) Science and Power in Environmental Governance - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
This course applies concepts from political ecology to study how governance, broadly defined, works in relation to the environment. Using case studies of international environmental issues, we will explore how people make decisions about the environment in a policy realm. We will discuss the role of various agents, such as governments, scientific bodies, and nongovernmental organizations, in the decision-making process. We will reflect on who has access to decisions; how scientific data is used; how environmental ideas become powerful; and how policies are legitimated. Armed with this information, we will consider how to advocate for global environmental sustainability and social equity.

(Spring) Nature and Gender: Representations of Women and Nature in American Literature (Nineteenth-Twentieth Century) - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 373NT, Gender Studies 333MM)
This course will focus on portrayals of women in nineteenth through mid-twentieth century America, particularly in the context of nature and landscape. We will explore how women, often objectified in visual images of the period, appropriated established devices or developed new images and structures to represent womanhood in their own terms. Texts will include selected poetry, sketches, autobiographical essays or memoirs, short stories, novels, paintings, films, and photography.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in English

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
In this course we will trace the representation of teenage girls in television and film from the 1950s to the present as a way to better understand how moving images shape culture. We will look closely at the notion of "entertainment" and at the ways in which moving image texts create ways of seeing and meaning.

(Fall) Introduction to Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course teaches the basic concepts, vocabulary, and critical skills involved in interpreting film. Through readings and lectures, students will become more informed and sophisticated observers of the cinema, key examples of which will be screened weekly. While the focus will be on the form and style of narrative film, documentary and avant-garde practices will be introduced. The class will also touch upon some of the major theoretical approaches in the field.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 screening (2 1/2 hours)

(Spring) Talking Pictures: An Introduction to Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement (ARTH 202)
Some of the best feature-length films of the past century have commanded our attention and imagination because of their compelling artistry and the imaginative ways they tell stories visually and verbally. This course closely studies narrative films from around the world, from the silent era to the present, and in the process it introduces students to the basic elements of film form, style, and narration. Some of the films to be considered are: Broken Blossoms, Battleship Potemkin, Citizen Kane, Contempt, The Bicycle Thief, Ugetsu, Rear Window, Woman in the Dunes, The Marriage of Maria Braun, Days of Heaven, and Moulin Rouge.

(Fall) Production Seminar in the Moving Image: Beginning Video Production: Eye to Ear
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
What is the relationship between image and sound in video? How does listening affect what we see and imagine? As an introduction to video art production, the course will provide a foundation in technical and conceptual skills for making short videos. We will explore the aesthetics and mechanics of shooting digital video, recording and mixing sound, and non-linear editing. Sonic expression will play a leading role in our exploration of video production and interpretation in narrative, documentary and experimental works. Coursework will include individual and group production projects, weekly screenings, readings, and several short writing assignments. Students will complete 3 short videos and a final project.
Prerequisites: Introduction to Film Studies. Application and permission of instructor required. Application found here: https://www.mtholyoke.edu/acad/film/course-application

FLMST-212-01 - Film Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) History of World Cinema Through 1960 - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course offers an historical survey of the cinema as a developing art form and a means of communication. We will examine the history of this international medium from its 19th-century beginnings through the mid-20th century. The national and thematic focus of the course shifts through the semester. For example, we will focus on U.S. film in studying the earliest developments in film technology and narrative, and on Soviet and French films to study the formal and social experimentation of the 1920s. The course provides a background for understanding film history and pursuing further studies in the field.
Prerequisites: Film Studies 201, 202 or 203 or Art History 202
Instructors: R. Blaetz
Expected enrollment: 40

(Spring) Global Film and Media After 1960
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course examines films and topics central to the study of global cinema since 1960. Special emphasis will be placed on the transnational organization of global film culture throughout this period. In addition to viewing films made in diverse national contexts (Thailand, France, Iran, the U.K., Japan), we will also analyze films and cultural formations that complicate cinema's relation to national boundaries, including works of exilic and diasporic cinema, international co-productions, and global film festivals.
Prerequisites: Film Studies 201, 202 or 203
Instructors: J. Guilford
Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) Film Theory: Cinema and the City
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.
This course offers an historical survey of film theory, from the work of its earliest authors and practitioners at the birth of the 20th century (who first struggled to define the medium), to those who are working still to elucidate the place of the cinema in relation to new media in its ever-evolving and ever more complex place in culture. As a way of focusing the discussion of the various theoretical positions, we will watch and discuss films that represent that most modern of phenomena - the city.
Prerequisites: Film Studies 201,202,or 203
Instructors: R. Blaetz
Expected enrollment: 19

(Spring) Film Theory: Philosophy and Film Theory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 275)
Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.
An exploration of philosophical issues encountered in the study of film. Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? These are examples of the topics to be discussed in this course as we investigate the nature of film and its relation to philosophy. There will be weekly required film screenings.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in Philosophy or Film Studies
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 screening (1.5 hours)

(English 217SC, Theatre Arts 234ST)
A study of ten to twelve plays and their film adaptations. Plays are drawn from a range of periods and genres, and films are chosen to show the scope of adaptive approaches from filmed play to radical re-imagining. The course will include readings on the theory and history of theatre-to-film adaptations. Playwrights will likely include Christopher Marlowe, Oscar Wilde, Tennessee Williams, Eugene O'Neill, Lorraine Hansberry, Edward Albee, Harold Pinter, David Mamet, and David Henry Hwang.
Prerequisites: 4 cr in English, Film Studies, or Theatre Arts
Instructors: S. Sutherland

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Representing the Holocaust in Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231RH)
To mark the seventieth anniversary of the end of World War II, this seminar explores the impact of films depicting the European Holocaust from the first encounter between the liberators and the survivors up to the present day. We analyze the global contexts in which the films came into being and the changing reception of the films with the advent of digital distribution. With a focus on less well-known films from newly distributed archival footage and more recent documentaries made by second- and third-generation children of survivors and perpetrators, we examine issues such as the precarious relationship between memory and history and the ethics of filming the dead and individuals in pain.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Notes: Students may consult with the instructor about taking this course for 300-level credit. Component course in Film Studies. Students wishing to receive credit in German Studies also must sign up for GRMST-295-02 Independent Study for 2 credits with Karen Remmler. This 2-credit addition will serve as the German discussion section for this course, time to be arranged. Contact Professor Remmler for permission.

(Music 220)
This course is for all who stay to the end of the credits, purchase soundtracks, and argue over who should have won the Oscar for Best Score, along with anyone else interested in the undervalued importance of music to the general effect of a motion picture. We will explore and discuss the myriad ways in which these two media interact. The course will focus on classic scores by Herrmann, Morricone, and Williams, as well as the uses of pre-existing music in films of Kubrick and Tarantino.

Prerequisites: Music 100, 102, 103, or 131

Instructors: D. Sanford

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 284)
The Oxford English Dictionary lists as its primary definition for "adaptation": "the bringing of two things together so as to effect a change in the nature of the objects." Our course considers the complex relationship between a source and its retellings, including the way in which such retellings permanently alter the source material and how each incarnation of a given narrative offers us a window of insight into a particular historical moment.
Readings/films will include Macbeth, Frankenstein, The Silence of the Lambs, and No Country for Old Men.

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Screenwriting: The Shape of Stories - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The screenplay is a unique and ephemeral form that exists as a blueprint for something else: a finished film. How do you convey on the page a story that will take shape within an audio-visual medium? The screenwriter must have an understanding of both the language of narrative film as well as the general shape and mechanics of film stories. This course will analyze both the language of film and the shape of film stories by looking at two modes of writing that are often at odds with each other: the three-act screenwriting as exemplified by Hollywood and the more elastic possibilities of the so-called "art film."

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr and permission of instructor Preference will be given to Five College Film Majors. Limited to 12 students. Please complete the questionnaire.

(Fall) Film Genre: The Musical Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific film genre. Some examples of genres that might be studied are: the science fiction, horror, melodrama, musical, Western, detective, or gangster film.
This course explores the American Musical Film from its first appearance in the late 1920s in early experiments with sound, through the films of Busby Berkeley and the MCM Musicals to its more recent revival in films such as Baz Luhrmann's "Moulin Rouge." The course also examines musical films from other national cinemas that either comment self-reflexively on the genre and its American context and/or expand common definitions of the genre.

(Fall) Film Genre: Film Genre and Gender - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Gender Studies 204FG) Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific film genre. Some examples of genres that might be studied are: the science fiction, horror, melodrama, musical, Western, detective, or gangster film.
This course examines the development of Hollywood film genres largely in the post-studio era, particularly the Western, the Melodrama, the Science Fiction and Horror film, and film noir. We will consider the evolution of these four genres in relation to changes in the film industry and in American society, especially in relation to gender.

(Fall) National/Transnational Cinema: American Films That Matter
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.

Certain American films stand out as works of art by combining strong narrative structure with striking visual presence. Ten of those films, from the silent era to the present, will be studied. In addition to weekly discussion, students will be responsible for analyzing opening sequences. Among the films to be considered are: The Grapes of Wrath, It's a Wonderful Life, Sunset Boulevard, Touch of Evil, Vertigo, Chinatown, Blade Runner, Do the Right Thing, and Beasts of the Southern Wild.

(Spring) National and Transnational Cinema: From Weimar to Nazi Germany: Film and Society
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231WN, Architectural Studies 280WN)

Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.

Discussing both canonical and lesser-known films from the Weimar and Nazi period, we explore various artistic tendencies, movements and genres in order to define cinema's complex role in representing social and historical experience. We pay special attention to the modes of constructing cinematic spaces, and the social utopias and catastrophes which cinema came to represent.

Notes: This course includes a mandatory weekly film screening. Taught in English.

(Spring) Documentary Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course examines the history, theory, and practice of the genre called Documentary Film. Between studying the "actualités" of the cinema's first practitioners and the self-reflexive postmodern works of contemporary filmmakers such as Errol Morris, we will investigate ethnographic film, cinema vérité, direct cinema, activist media, personal essay films, docudramas, and "mockumentaries." We will examine the formal structures through which these films make meaning and explore theoretical questions concerning notions of truth, ethics, and politics.

(Spring) Production Seminar: The Prison Birth Project
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Community-based learning course)
Preamble (for topics courses): In this class, students will take the skills and insights gained in introductory production courses and, working individually or in pairs, develop them over the length of the semester through the creation of one short project, 10 minutes long. Students may choose to work in narrative, documentary, experimental, or hybrid forms.
Professor Bernadine Mellis will co-teach this course with embedded practitioners from the Holyoke-based Prison Birth Project, Lisa Andrews and Marisa Pizzi. The course will bring together the study of critical digital media production with an examination of the Prison Birth Project's work at the intersection of the reproductive justice movement and the battle for incarcerated people's rights. Assigned readings will focus on reproductive justice and carceral state, grassroots fundraising, alternative organizational structures, and the relationship between art and activism. Skills-based class sessions will introduce students to several modes of media production, including digital storytelling, video production and post-production, smartphone digital photography, and graphic design. As a part of the course, students will collaborate to generate media content for the Prison Birth Project's public education and advocacy efforts.
Prerequisites: Application required. Should have FLMST-210 and either FLMST-201 or one course at the 100 level in Politics or Gender Studies.
Instructors: B. Mellis

(Fall) Seminar in Film Studies: Philosophy of Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 375/SP)
Many critics considered Kathryn Bigelow's Zero Dark Thirty to be the best film of 2012, but it was also widely criticized for seeming to promote torture. Movies can be morally dangerous, seemingly endorsing or even promoting immoral or discriminatory ideals, or romanticizing immoral characters and behavior, as in Hannibal Lecter from Silence of the Lambs (Thomas Harris, 1991). In this course, we evaluate the arguments given for treating certain movies as immoral, and we examine whether and how our moral evaluations of movies should affect us. When, if ever, are movies immoral? Should certain movies be censored? Should we withhold praise from morally objectionable movies?

(Spring) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Memory (of) War
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 340MW; Critical Social Thought 349MW)
The medium of cinema has shown persistent concern with war and memory, and has constituted a heated battleground for rememberance and erasure of the past. Through cinema, in other words, we most clearly see both memories of war and subsequent wars among competing memories. The Spanish Civil War (1936-1939), the repressive military regime of Francisco Franco (1939-1975), and recent attempts to "recuperate" memory all dramatize these dynamics and raise a number of larger questions. How do destruction and devastation register through the visual? What happens when we attempt to police memory (through censorship, propaganda, etc.)? What and why do people choose to remember or forget?

(Spring) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Visualizing Immigrant Narratives: Migration in Film
(Latina/o Studies 350VN)
This course offers an interrogation of overt and embedded narratives of migrants and the migration process in popular and documentary film, paying specific attention to cinematic representations of non-citizen bodies confronting migration, deportation, labor, acculturation, and anti-immigrant hysteria. Film screenings and class discussions comprise the interpretative lens through which students will examine the aesthetic, cultural, economic, gendered, historical, political, racial, and sexual dimensions of cultural texts. The course is supplemented with readings about immigration policies and histories.

(Latina/o Studies 335)
This seminar offers an interrogation of the ways in which Latinas and Latinos are represented in the cinema. We will explore early portrayals of Latinas and Latinos in film history and then explore contemporary cinema with a focus on race, class, gender and sexuality in these representations. Employing multiple aesthetic and disciplinary approaches we will analyze commercial films alongside independent films with particular attention to the market-driven and political mandates of these projects. We will focus on films by both Latina/o filmmakers and non-Latina/o filmmakers interrogating the multifarious points of entry of these artists.

(GNDST-333FC, LATAM-374)
How do labor relationships and the social construction of what work means affect our lives as well as our communities? How do they contribute to shape our identities? In which ways can our gender, sexual orientation, race, social class or migratory status define our working possibilities? How do the concepts of marginality and informality emerge to identify the precarious Latin American labor conditions? Through Latin American films, students will problematize the idea of service, worker, industry, classic and non-classic work, sexual and affective work, and child labor, among others.

(Spring) Topics in Experimental Film: American Avant-Garde Cinema
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): This topics course provides advanced instruction in an aspect of film history, theory, or criticism. Students are expected to bring substantial background in the study of film to this course; enrollment may be limited.
This course examines the history of American avant-garde film, paying special attention to the alternative cultural institutions that have facilitated experimental cinema's emergence and longevity in the U.S. since the 1940s. We will consider how the avant-garde's interest in creating an alternative cinema necessitated a dramatic reorganization of existing modes of filmic production, distribution, exhibition, reception, and preservation. Students will analyze the major artistic tendencies that have defined the postwar American avant-garde, as well as the broader institutional practices involved in the production and maintenance of experimental film culture.

(Spring) Elementary French

This course will examine the work of contemporary American filmmaker Terrence Malick. While taking into account technical aspects (cinematography, music), ours will be a largely thematic discussion, looking at recurring themes such as good vs. evil, nature vs. culture and spirituality. Selected critical essays will deepen our conversation and reveal some of the myriad literary, philosophical and theological texts that serve as the conceptual underpinnings of Malick's films. We will also discuss why these films, especially The Tree of Life (2011), have proved so polarizing, provoking intense and vehement reactions -- both positive and negative -- on the part of spectators.

Prerequisites: fy

Notes: The course will include several evening screenings, attendance at which will be strongly encouraged but not required.

The French detective novel found its origins in Poe and in the disillusionment and malaise of the increasingly urban universe of the nineteenth century. It generally centered on a dark, mysterious Parisian atmosphere that spoke to a growing public awareness of the worlds of crime and of the police. Realist novelists, in particular Dostoevsky, enriched the genre's conventions, but the detective novel evolved beyond realism as it moved into the twentieth century, combining unsettling social critique with reassuringly flawless reasoning. The usual periodization of French literature and culture is by century. Some period courses focus on the characteristics of specific centuries. Others focus on artistic or intellectual movements: gothic, Renaissance, romantic. All period courses, whatever their conceptual framework, integrate texts and historical contexts.

Preamble (for topics courses): The usual periodization of French literature and culture is by century. Some period courses focus on the characteristics of specific centuries. Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.

Study of this crucial and problematic relationship in modern novels and films from Romance cultures. Exploration of the mother-daughter bond as literary theme, social institution, psychological dynamic, and metaphor for female creativity. Readings include Western myths and diverse theories of family arrangements (Rousseau, Freud, Chodorow, Rich, Irigaray, Giorgio, Mernissi, Nnaemeka). Authors and films will be grouped cross-culturally by theme and chosen from among: Colette, Vivanti, Morante, Ernaux, Tusquets, Roy, Roig, Rodoreda, Martin Gaite, Ramondino, Pimeau, Beyala, Bouraoui; films: Children of Montmartre (La maternelle); Indochine; The Silences of the Palace; My Mother Likes Women.

Prerequisites: For Language Majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200 level. Also open to non-language majors with no prerequisite.

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French must read texts and write papers in French to receive credit. This is a multimedia course where students achieve digital literacy. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in LRC.

(Spring) Courses on Social and Political Issues and Critical Approaches: Family Romances: Memories of Childhood in French and Francophone Fiction and Film

Study of twentieth-century narratives of childhood from French-speaking cultures. How has the conception of childhood varied across time and different societies? What forms and techniques have writers, filmmakers, and artists used to render early life experiences? With what social, psychological, and aesthetic issues have their stories engaged? What ideologies underlie and limit the Western "family romance" model of development? Authors may include: Colette; Pérec; Ernaux; Nothomb; Laye; Chamoiseau; Begag; Sebbar; films: Les 400 coups; Diabolo Menthe; La Rue Casse-Nègres; Chocolat; L'espiaire.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

(Spring) Courses on Social and Political Issues and Critical Approaches: Writing and Politics: Literature as Social Engagement - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses examine a definable phenomenon—an idea, a movement, an event, a mentality, a cultural structure or system, an historical problem, a critical mode—relevant to the civilization of France or of French-speaking countries. Readings from a variety of disciplines shed light on the particular aspect of thought or culture being studied.
Study of French and Francophone writers, filmmakers, and artists, in their specific contexts, whose works engage with important political and social issues of their time and place. Preliminary readings theorize how texts can communicate, explicitly or implicitly, an ideological stance. We will then consider imaginative works, from the Middle Ages to the present, whose thematic, narrative, cinematic, stylistic, or linguistic techniques connect with movements for social or cultural change.

Prerequisites: 12 credits including two courses at the advanced level, or permission of department chair and course instructor

Notes: 1 meeting (2 hours, 50 minutes)

(Fall) Courses on Women and Gender: Every Secret Thing - Contemporary Women's Autobiographical Narrative

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses explore cultural, literary, and social issues relating to women and gender identities in France and French-speaking countries. Topics may include women's writing, writing about women and men, the status of women, feminist criticism, and theories of sexuality and sexual difference.

This course will examine contemporary autobiographical narratives written by women, with a particular focus on authors whose works include multiple autobiographical texts of various genres: fictional, nonfictional, and semifictional. We will analyze the ways in which these authors present their life stories, especially the traumatic or secret episodes, and the ways in which their works discuss the process of that presentation and of memory itself. Themes that are common to these autobiographical texts include: relationships with family, education, sexuality, class, and love. In addition to literary texts, we will analyze in detail several autobiographical films made by women.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

Instructors: C. Rivers

(Spring) Advanced Level Seminar: Banned Books - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): The seminar is intended to challenge students at the highest level. A regular rotation of topics ensures a variety of perspectives across genre and period, encompassing linguistic, literary, theoretical, and cultural issues of French and Francophone studies.

Development of critical skills is stressed through classroom discussion and critique of writing projects, drawing on individual student interests and experiences as they relate to the topic of the course.

This seminar will address questions of literary censorship in France in the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries. We will read literary texts banned at various moments in history, situate the moments of both their publication and censoring in a historical and literary historical context, and attempt to answer the following fundamental questions: who bans what, when and why? We will examine the explicitly political, religious, and/or sexual thematic content of the texts. We will try to establish distinctions between more textual taboos and those which would appear to be universal. We will view banned films as well.

Gender Studies

GNDST-101-01 - Gender Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Gender Studies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course is designed to introduce students to social, cultural, historical, and political perspectives on gender and its construction. Through discussion and writing, we will explore the intersections among gender, race, class, and sexuality in multiple settings and contexts. Taking an interdisciplinary approach to a variety of questions, we will consider the distinctions between sex and gender, women's economic status, the making of masculinity, sexual violence, queer movements, racism, and the challenges of feminist activism across nations, and possibilities for change. We will also examine the development of feminist theory, including its promises and challenges.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar
Critical thinkers from a growing number of disciplines are interrogating the longstanding “human-animal binary,” asking difficult and provocative questions about the nature of life and the politics of being. In this course, first-year students will explore "the animal question" from a variety of perspectives, revisiting their own assumptions and experiences as they discover the interspecies networks that constitute the changing environment of Mount Holyoke. Special attention will be paid to the discourse of species as it intersects with other forms of difference. For their final project, students will create and publish an online bestiary of the ecosystems that shape our campus community.

(Spring) Methods and Practices in Feminist Scholarship
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This is a class about doing research as a feminist. We will explore questions such as: What makes feminist research feminist? What makes it research? What are the proper objects of feminist research? Who can do feminist research? What can feminist research do? Are there feminist ways of doing research? Why and how do the stories we tell in our research matter? Some of the key issues and themes we will address include: accountability, location, citational practices and politics, identifying stakes and stakeholders, intersectionality, inter/disciplinarity, choosing and describing our topics and methods, and research as storytelling. The class will be writing intensive and will culminate in each student producing a research portfolio.

(Taught in English; Asian Studies 215, Theatre Arts 234CW)
Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China’s social changes and the women’s movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: Queer and Trans Writing
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; ENGL 219QT)
What do we mean when we say "queer writing" or "trans writing"? Are we talking about writing by queer and/or trans authors? Writing about queer or trans practices, identities, experience? Writing that subverts conventional forms? All of the above? In this course, we will engage these questions not theoretically but through praxis. We will read fiction, poetry, comics, creative nonfiction, and hybrid forms. Expect to encounter work that challenges you in terms of form and content. Some writers we may read include Ryka Aoki, James Baldwin, Tom Cho, Samuel R. Delany, kari edwards, Elisha Lim, Audre Lorde, Cherríe Moraga, Eileen Myles, and David Wojnarowicz.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: Embodiment in Theory: Precarious Lives from Marx to Butler
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; German Studies 231EM, Critical Social Thought 249EM)
We examine the writing of major nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first century theorists, such as Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, Dubois, Arendt, Fanon, Foucault, Butler, and others through the lens of embodiment. Rather than read theory as an abstract entity, we explore how theory itself is an embodiment of actual lives in which human beings experience life as precarious. What are the social conditions that create vulnerable bodies? How do thinkers who lived or are living precarious lives represent these bodies? Through a series of case studies based on contemporary examples of precarity, we examine the legacy and materiality of critical social thought.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latina/o Studies 250CU, Latin American Studies 287CU)
This course introduces students to critical and creative works that center Cuba and its diasporas. The primary questions of the course are: How have authors variably imagined Cuba over time and across space? How are these imaginations of Cuba politically, economically, and culturally situated? Students will question the personal/national and the public/private across a range of texts that explore issues of exile, nostalgia, memory, and nationalism. Readings include works by Cristina Garcia, Ana Menendez, Pablo Medina, Achy Obejas, Roberto G. Fernandez, Carmelita Tropicana, Richard Blanco, and Rachel Kushner and readings by Gustavo Pérez Firmat, Sheila Croucher, and Louis A. Pérez, Jr.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 218LT, Latina/o Studies 212)
We will explore a number of readings across different genres (the novel, play, poem, short story, graphic novel). Students will endeavor to understand how each author defines Latinidad. What characterizes Latina/o for each of these writers and how do their works articulate the historical conditions out of which they emerge? How is Latina/o literature marked by notions of language, nationality, gender, sexuality, class, race, politics, form, genre? The readings will provide both a survey of general ideas in the study of Latina/o literatures as well as specific case studies and historical examples. The reading list is not meant to be comprehensive but to provide a sampling of texts.

(Fall) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: Worthy Hearts and Saucy Wits - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 239WH)
Eighteenth-century England witnessed the birth of the novel, a genre that in its formative years was both lauded for its originality and condemned as intellectually and morally dangerous, especially for young women. We will trace the numerous prose genres that influenced early novelists, including conduct manuals, epistolary writing, conversion narratives, travelogues, romance, and the gothic. In doing so, we will concomitantly examine the novel's immense formal experimentation alongside debates about developing notions of gender and class as well as the feeling, thinking individual. Authors may include Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Walpole, Burney, and others.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of History: Trans Histories, Identities, and Communities
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will examine the history of trans communities and identities and the development of trans activism in the US, focusing on how race, gender, sexuality, and class have affected transgender lives, communities, and politics. In doing so we will explore a number of topics including the social, medical, and political constructions of gender deviance; medical and social constructions of transsexuality; social, political, and other constructions of the category transgender; and the politics of trans liberation. While we will focus on the US, we will also briefly explore some examples of "trans" identities and communities in other parts of the world.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of History: African Women: Food and Power - *Not offered this year/term
(Community-based learning course; History 296AF)
This course uses archival records, fiction, life histories, and outstanding recent scholarship to investigate African women’s actions in a century that encompassed women’s loss of agency and authority but the endurance of their responsibility for the production of food. We investigate the erosion of women’s economic power and the loss of women’s work of governing at conquest, in the early colonial period, and as a consequence of Africa’s integration into the world economy as its least powerful player. We examine women’s efforts to sustain productive activities in the face of opposition and the gendered tensions these efforts provoke. Optional fourth hour discussions.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of History: African American Women and United States History
(History 280AA, Africana Studies 241FW)
How is our understanding of U.S. history transformed when we place African American women at the center of the story? This course will examine the exclusion of African American women from dominant historical narratives and the challenge to those narratives presented by African American women's history through an investigation of selected topics in the field.

(Fall) Women and Gender in the Study of History: U.S. Women’s History since 1890 - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 276)
This course introduces students to the major themes of U.S. women's history from the 1880s to the present. We will look both at the experiences of a diverse group of women in the U.S. as well as the ideological meaning of gender as it evolved and changed over the twentieth century. We will chart the various meanings of womanhood (for example, motherhood, work, the domestic sphere, and sexuality) along racial, ethnic, and class lines and in different regions, and will trace the impact multiple identities have had on women's social and cultural activism.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(PHIL 249)
The goal of this course is to see how careful philosophical thought can help us with pressing issues that women face. We approach this topic through a distinctly feminist lens, as opposed to a traditional philosophical, queer theoretic, or gender studies lens. We will draw on a variety of philosophical resources, ranging from liberal and feminist political theory, to speech act theory. Possible questions we will consider include: What is objectification? What is consent? Is pornography degrading? How does sexism and bias lead to bad science?

(Fall) Feminist Theory: Feminist and Queer Theory

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

We will read a number of key feminist texts that theorize sexual difference, and challenge the oppression of women. We will then address queer theory, an offshoot and expansion of feminist theory, and study how it is both embedded in, and redefines, the feminist paradigms. This redefinition occurs roughly at the same time (1980s/90s) when race emerges as one of feminism's prominent blind spots. The postcolonial critique of feminism is a fourth vector we will examine, as well as anti-racist and postcolonial intersections with queerness. We will also study trans-theory and its challenge to the queer paradigm.

Politics 233

This course explores the overlapping dualities of the feminine and the masculine, the private and the public, the home and the world. We examine different forms of power over the body; the ways gender and sexual identities reinforce or challenge the established order; and the cultural determinants of "women's emancipation." We emphasize the politics of feminism, dealing with themes that include culture, democracy, and the particularly political role of theory and on theoretical attempts to grasp the complex ties and tensions between sex, gender, and power.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

Anthropology 216HP
Health is about bodies, selves and politics. We will explore a series of health topics from feminist perspectives. How do gender, sexuality, class, disability, and age influence the ways in which one perceives and experiences health and the access one has to health information and health care? Are heteronormativity, cissexism, or one's place of living related to one's health status or one's health risk? By paying close attention to the relationships between community-based narratives, activities of health networks and organizations and theory, we will develop a solid understanding of the historical, political and cultural specificities of health issues, practices, services and movements.

(Spring) Gender and Power in Global Contexts: Sexual and Reproductive Rights in Latin America
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; POLIT 255RP)
Since the 1990s Latin America has witnessed increasing societal and political debates over sexual and reproductive rights. Issues such as abortion, gay marriage, transgender rights, sexual education and assisted reproductive technology have risen to the top of some countries' agendas after decades of silence, taboos, and restrictive or non-existent legislation. The course aims to provide a survey of sexual and reproductive rights in the region as a whole while at the same time highlighting the disparities that exist within it. The course analyzes the multiple factors behind the current policies focusing particularly on the role of women and LGBT movements advancing more liberal legislation.
Prerequisites: Previous coursework in Latin American Studies and/or Gender Studies recommended.

(Politics 255PA)
The Americas have been characterized by the strictness of their laws in the criminalization of abortion. In some countries abortion is criminalized even when the woman's life is at risk. What role have women's movements played in advancing abortion rights? What has mattered most for a movement's success, its internal characteristics or external forces? Has the way the movement framed its demands mattered? How has the political influence of the Catholic and Evangelical churches influenced policies in this area? We will answer these questions by exploring examples from across the region through primary and secondary sources.

(Spring) Field Placement
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course; Speaking-intensive)
This course presents an opportunity for students to apply gender theory to practice and synthesize their work in gender studies. Connections between the academy and the community, scholarship and social action will be emphasized. Students will arrange for a placement at a non-profit organization, business, or institution that incorporates a gender focus. A weekly seminar with other students provides a structured reflection forum to analyze experience and methods.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: De Brujas y Lesbiana and Other "Bad Women" in the Spanish Empire/Of Witches and Lesbians and Other "Bad Women' in the Spanish Empire
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 330BW)
During the Spanish Empire (16th-18th centuries), witches, prostitutes, transvestite warriors, lesbians and daring noblewomen and nuns violated the social order by failing to uphold the expected sexual morality of the ideal woman. They were silenced, criticized, punished, and even burned at the stake. Students will study contradictory discourses of good and evil and beauty and ugliness in relation to gender in the Spanish Empire. We will analyze historical and literary texts as well as film versions of so-called "bad" women--such as the Celestina, Elena/o de Céspedes, Catalina de Erauso and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Women and the Family in Imperial China
(Writing-intensive; HIST 301WF)
This course examines the lives of women in imperial China (221 BCE-1911). How did Confucian didactic texts define women and their place in the family? Seen as the core of the family in a patrilineal, patrilocal, and patriarchal society, men prescribed women's roles in family life. How did women understand and respond to the social expectations imposed on them? What changed over the long history of imperial China? Students consider writings by and about women alongside the evidence of material culture.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: The Philosophy of Recognition
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 353RC, Critical Social Thought 349RC)
Since the 1960s, many social movements for justice, equality, and inclusion in our world have taken the form of struggles for recognition (e.g., antiracism, feminism, multiculturalism, LGBT activism, etc.). What is recognition in this sense and conversely misrecognition, i.e., the sort of harm or injustice done to someone or certain populations of people by failing or choosing not to recognize them? How can (mis)recognition show up and be theorized both as a matter of how people are (unjustly) socially constituted and how they should (not) treat one another? We will discuss readings (among others) from Rousseau, Hegel, Marx, Hannah Arendt, Iris Young, Charles Taylor, Axel Honneth, Nancy Fraser, and Patchen Markell.
Prerequisites: One prior course at the 200 level in philosophy, politics, sociology, critical social thought, or gender studies. Not open to first-year students.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Latin American Cinema: Beyond the Farm and the Factory
(LATAM-374)
How do labor relationships and the social construction of what work means affect our lives as well as our communities? How do they contribute to shape our identities? In which ways can our gender, sexual orientation, race, social class or migratory status define our working possibilities? How do the concepts of marginality and informality emerge to identify the precarious Latin American labor conditions? Through Latin American films, students will problematize the idea of service, worker, industry, classic and non-classic work, sexual and affective work, and child labor, among others.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(CST 349AX)
Dragon ladies, lotus blossoms, geisha girls--the U.S. cultural imaginary is saturated with myths regarding Asian sexuality and gender. This interdisciplinary course intervenes into this dominant imaginary by exploring feminist and queer frameworks derived from Asian-American contexts: immigration, labor, racial stereotyping, militarization, citizenship, and so-called "terrorism." Through a mix of scholarly, creative, activist, and media texts, we will challenge preconceived notions about Asian Americans as regressive, repressed, or hyper-sexual, as well as examine the powerful counter-imaginaries offered within Asian American literature and culture.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 333ML)
What world gave rise to Mary Lyon's vision for Mount Holyoke and enabled her to carry her plans to success? What local and global circumstances subsequently shaped the institution and the women who passed through it? How did Mount Holyoke women attempt to fashion the worlds they encountered in and beyond South Hadley and what came of their efforts? We will inquire into the historical arrangements of power--involving race, class, gender, religion, culture, body politics, and colonialism--that formed Mount Holyoke and the world in which it has operated. Students write a substantial research paper based on primary and secondary sources.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Race / Nation / Gender: Feminist Studies of Scientific, Medical and 'Patient' Mobility - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Anthropology 316RN)
This seminar explores the potentially novel entanglements of 'race', 'nation' and 'gender' through the increasing transnationalization of scientific and medical practices, the mobility of practitioners and consumers, and the mobilization of scientific and medical knowledge by individuals and communities, as well as governmental and civil society organizations. We will engage with the multiple tensions in feminist research on topics such as diversity, population and medical genomics, and reproductive and medical tourism as the multiple and shifting identities of experts and 'lay' individuals call attention to the power and problematics of scientific, medical and patient 'diasporas'.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Prison Nation: Criminalization and Mass Incarceration in the U.S.
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
Since the 1970s, the United States has engaged in the most massive expansion of a prison system in modern history. Scholars have called the current era of U.S. imprisonment "mass incarceration" to mark the systematic imprisonment of black, Latina/o, and native people, poor people, and some LGBT populations. This course will examine the political, economic, and social conditions that produced mass incarceration as well as its ongoing material effects. We will also analyze mass incarceration and the prison as a site of social, racial, gender, and sexual formation. To do so, the course will center on black feminist and queer analysis.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Topic: Viragos, Virgins & Visionaries - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(French 351VR)
In this course, we will study the three most celebrated French female saints: Jeanne d'Arc, Thérèse de Lisieux and Bernadette de Lourdes. Their stories are similar: ordinary young women to whom extraordinary things happened, who became symbols of France and inspired a rich verbal and visual iconography. Yet they are profoundly different: Joan was a warrior, Thérèse a memoirist, Bernadette a visionary. We will study the facts of their lives, in their own words and those of others, but also the many fictions, semi-fictions, myths and legends based on those lives. We will analyze a number of films and visual images as well as literary and non-literary texts in our attempt to understand these cases of specifically female, specifically French sainthood.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Women in American Theatre and Drama - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Theatre Arts 35/WO)
This course offers a history of women in performance, from the colonial era to the present day. Americans inherited a European theatrical economy that was largely male dominated, though actresses played a central role on stage and in the public imagination. Today, while serious inequities remain, women are gaining access to the most privileged and powerful positions in a swiftly changing field. We are therefore equally interested in how women have participated in theatrical culture—as actors, producers, playwrights, directors, designers, managers, and audience members—and how they have been represented on commercial, experimental, and regional stages, and across genres and communities.
Prerequisites: Gender Studies 101 or Theatre Arts 100 or Theatre Arts 251 or Theatre Arts/Critical Social Thought 252

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Embodiments
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Em)bodi/ment: body/mind. How does our culture fantasize about severing them? Where is there ever pure mind, pure body? Who counts as able, as broken, or as food? How does discipline, punishment, and usefulness come into play? What is agency and knowledge in relation to embodiment? We will study different "problem" cases of embodiment where the fabric of culture begins to unravel: athletics, birthing, breeding and assisted reproduction, chronic illness, dairy, disability, drugs, dying, fatness, pregnancy, queerness, sexuality, speech ("disorder"), and others. Much of the seminar's agenda will be driven by students' own research and interests in studying embodiment.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Psychology of Trauma - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Psychology 329PT)
What happens after a traumatic event? Why do some people develop psychological disorders and others do not? This course will explore the psychological theories and research on trauma and stress. Topics covered will include childhood abuse, domestic violence, combat violence, community violence, and interpersonal violence. The seminar will explore psychological dysfunction, disorders, as well as adaptation and coping following exposure to traumatic stress. In addition, the course will explore the concept of "cultural trauma."
Prerequisites: Jr, Sr, 100-level Psychology course and Psychology 200. A course in abnormal psychology preferred.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Latina Feminism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Latina/o Studies 35/FM, CST-349FM)
This interdisciplinary course explores Latina feminism as a distinct mode of thought and inquiry. In particular, we will examine how Latina feminist approaches inform our research questions, allow us to analyze women's experiences and women's history, and challenges patriarchy and gender inequality. We will explore topics related to the politics of feminist analysis, representation, colonialism and empire, and Latina feminist methodologies. Our approach in this class will employ an interlocking analysis to feminist theory that understands the interconnectedness between multiple forms of oppression, including race, class, sexuality, and ability. Our goal is to develop an understanding of how Latina feminist methodology and epistemology can be tools for social change.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Egg Cells and Embryos: Innovations in Reproductive and Genetic Technologies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Anthropology 316EG)
This seminar will focus on emerging innovations in the development, use and governance of reproductive and genetic technologies (RGTs). How do novel developments at the interface of fertility treatment and biomedical research raise both new and enduring questions about the "naturalness" of procreation, the politics of queer families, the im/possibilities of disabilities, and transnational citizenship? Who has a say in what can be done and for which purposes? We will engage with ethnographic texts, documentaries, policy statements, citizen science activist projects, and social media in order to closely explore the diversity of perspectives in this field.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Gender and Class in the Victorian Novel - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 323)
This course will investigate how representations of gender and class serve as a structuring principle in the development of the genre of the Victorian novel in Britain. We will devote significant attention to the construction of Victorian femininity and masculinity in relation to class identity, marriage as a sexual contract, and the gendering of labor. The texts chosen for this course also reveal how gender and class are constructed in relation to other axes of identity in the period, such as race, sexuality, and national character. Novelists will include Dickens, Eliot, Gaskell, C. Bronte, and Hardy.
Supplementary readings in literary criticism and theory.

GNDST-333-FA - Gender Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Modern Families: Race/Ethnicity, Kinship and U.S. Popular Culture - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Latina/o Studies 332)
This course examines the social construction of the family unit in the United States across a range of historical periods and cultural texts. Students will dismantle universalist notions of what constitutes a family (particularly the nuclear family), understanding it instead as a social unit articulated by issues of race/ethnicity, gender, and sexuality and (re)produced with spatial and temporal specificities. Engaging first with historical texts to understand kinship as a legal, political and economic project, we will then turn to cultural production to investigate the role that literature, film, television, and art play in reifying, challenging, and/or reproducing the family.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Race, Gender, and Empire: Cultural Histories of the United States and the World - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 301RG)
Recent cultural histories of imperialism--European as well as U.S.--have illuminated the workings of race and gender at the heart of imperial encounters. This course will examine the United States’ relationship to imperialism through the lens of such cultural histories. How has the encounter between Europe and America been remembered in the United States? How has the cultural construction of "America" and its "others" called into play racial and gender identities? How have the legacies of slavery been entwined with U.S. imperial ambitions at different times? And what can we learn from transnational approaches to "the intimacies of empire"?

(Taught in English; Asian Studies 340)
A seminar on the eighteenth-century Chinese masterpiece The Story of the Stone and selected literary criticism in response to this work. Discussions will focus on love, gender-crossing, and women's supremacy and the paradoxical treatments of these themes in the novel. We will explore multiple aspects of these themes, including the sociopolitical, philosophical, and literary milieu of eighteenth-century China. We will also examine this novel in its relation to Chinese literary tradition in general and the generic conventions of premodern Chinese vernacular fiction in particular.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 373NT, Environmental Studies 373WN)
This course will focus on portrayals of women in nineteenth through mid-twentieth century America, particularly in the context of nature and landscape. We will explore how women, often objectified in visual images of the period, appropriated established devices or developed new images and structures to represent womanhood in their own terms. Texts will include selected poetry, sketches, autobiographical essays or memoirs, short stories, novels, paintings, films, and photography.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Natural’s Not in It: Pedro Almodóvar - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Film Studies 380PA, Spanish 340PA)

This course studies the films of Pedro Almodóvar, European cinema’s favorite bad boy turned acclaimed auteur. On the one hand, students learn to situate films within the context of contemporary Spanish history (the transition to democracy, the advent of globalization, etc.) in order to consider the local contours of postmodern aesthetics. On the other hand, the films provide a springboard to reflect on larger theoretical and ethical debates. For instance, what can a weeping transvestite teach us about desire? What happens when plastic surgery and organ transplants become metaphors? Under what circumstances, if any, can spectators find child prostitution cute?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Anthropology 316PG)

Deep brain stimulation, genome sequencing, regenerative medicine...Exploring practices of ‘participatory governance’ of emerging technologies, we will examine the formal and informal involvement of citizens, patients, health professionals, scientists and policy makers. What initiatives exist at local, national and transnational levels to foster science literacy? How do lived experiences of nationality, ability, class, race, ethnicity, gender and sexuality become visible and/or disappear within constructed frameworks of participatory governance? How can feminist ethnographic research and feminist theory contribute to a larger project of democratizing knowledge production and governance?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Taught in English; Romance Language & Literature 375MD, Spanish 360MD, Italian 361MD, French 321MD)

Study of this crucial and problematic relationship in modern novels and films from Romance cultures. Exploration of the mother-daughter bond as literary theme, social institution, psychological dynamic, and metaphor for female creativity. Readings include Western myths and diverse theories of family arrangements (Rousseau, Freud, Chodorow, Rich, Irigaray, Giorgio, Mernissi, Nnaemeka). Authors and films will be grouped cross-culturally by theme and chosen from among: Colette, Vivanti, Morante, Ernaux, Tusquets, Roy, Roig, Rodoreda, Martin Guitt, Ramondino, Pineau, Beyala, Bourouai; films: Children of Montmartre (La maternelle); Indochine; The Silences of the Palace; My Mother Likes Women.

Prerequisites: For Language Majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200level. Also open to non-language majors with no prerequisite.

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Latina/o Immigration
(Community-based learning course; Latina/o Studies 360, Sociology 316MM)
The course provides an historical and topical overview of Latina/o migration to the United States. We will examine the economic, political, and social antecedents to Latin American migration, and the historical impact of the migration process in the U.S. Considering migration from Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean, we will discuss the social construction of race, the gendered nature of migration, migrant labor struggles, Latin American-U.S. Latino relations, immigration policy, and border life and enforcement. Notions of citizenship, race, class, gender, and sexuality will be central to our understanding of the complexity at work in the migration process.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Witches in the Modern Imagination - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Theatre Arts 350/WT)
From the middle ages to the present day, witches have evoked both fear and fascination. Their fellowships (real or fantastic) challenged the prevailing power structures of church and state patriarchies and upset the ordered precepts of the modern world. This seminar offers an overview of the history of witchcraft in Atlantic cultures, with special attention to the early modern British and American colonial eras. We will examine figures of the witch in European art; religious and legal texts that document the persecution of sorcerers; and dramatic, literary, and cinematic representations of witches that have helped to shape our understanding of gender, nature, theatricality, and power.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, Gender Studies 101, and required online application, preference to Gender Studies and Theatre Arts majors.

Geography

GEOG-105-01 - Geography - 2016-2017
(Fall) World Regional Geography
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course surveys the major geographic regions of the world in terms of environmental features and resource distributions, economic mainstays, population characteristics, cultural processes, social relationships, and patterns of urbanization and industrial growth. In addition to these topical foci, we use various sub-fields of geography to animate different regions. This approach provides a sense of depth while we also pursue a breadth of knowledge about the world.

(Spring) Sustainable Cities
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
Based on present estimates, for the first time in human history, more people now live in urban than rural areas, and population growth projections for the next century indicate that most growth will take place in urban areas. Given this context, this course examines the social, economic, and environmental dimensions of urban sustainability. Topics explored in the course include urban and ecological systems, air and water quality, green design, energy and transportation systems, demographic trends, climate change impacts, and the role of technology in promoting urban sustainability.

GEOG-313-01 - Geography - 2016-2017
(Fall) Third World Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
Offers an interdisciplinary perspective on social, economic, and political features of contemporary development in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, regions referred to as the Third World or the South, and provides an introduction to theoretical origins and definitions of economic growth, development, and underdevelopment. It then addresses more specific aspects of development such as trends in population growth, migration, and urbanization; agrarian change; livelihood strategies and aspects of social welfare such as health, education, and shelter; poverty and the environment; and external economic relationships. The latter part of the course draws extensively on selected case studies.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 4 credits in Geography and 4 credits in related social sciences at 200-level

GEOG-320-01 - Geography - 2016-2017
(Spring) Research with Geospatial Technologies - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Geographic Information Systems (GIS) and remote sensing are essential tools for geographic analysis in both the biophysical and social sciences. This course uses a semester-long project that includes field and laboratory instruction to allow students to develop hands-on skills with spatial data and analysis software. Students will be able to present potential employers with a portfolio containing examples of their ability to develop and execute a GIS/remote sensing application project.
Prerequisites: Geography 205
Instructors: T. Millette
Expected enrollment: 15

GEOG-325-01 - Geography - 2016-2017
(Spring) Conflict and Displacement in Africa
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking-intensive)
This course provides an analytical approach to the study of civil/armed conflicts and displacement in post-independent Africa. Using cases from West Africa, Horn of Africa, and the Great Lake region, the course examines geographic, political and economic contexts in which armed conflicts occur by identifying and evaluating competing explanations of the underpinnings of civil conflicts. It analyzes the role of some of the widely debated features of Africa's civil conflicts, including systems of governance, impact of natural resources, questions of sovereignty and self-determination, construction and manipulation of ethnic/cultural identities, impact of religion, and regional inequalities.

Geology

GEOL-100-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Physical Geology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Humans are intimately connected with and dependent upon the physical environment. We have only been present on the Earth for a brief span, but we try to understand how the Earth has evolved since its formation over four billion years ago. Our knowledge of the Earth is critical, not only for reconstructing its history, but also for helping us to understand issues relevant to our lives, such as the availability of natural resources, pollution, climate change, and natural hazards. In this course, we will perform a general survey of the physical Earth. In classroom, lab and field, we will examine rocks and minerals of which the solid Earth is composed, processes that generate the Earth's landforms, natural hazards associated with those processes, and geologic time.

GEOL-101-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Environmental Geology with Lab - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The only planet known to sustain life, Earth provides all the resources that sustain us, yet it can be an unpredictable and sometimes dangerous home. Floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and other natural processes challenge our ingenuity, while we also contend with self-induced problems such as pollution, desertification, and even global climate change. This course examines earth processes, how these affect our lives, and how we can best live with and sustain our environment. The labs cover selected geologic topics including methods for recognizing and interpreting environmental hazards, and developing strategies to address environmental problems.

Prerequisites: Preference given to first- and second- year students during the first week of registration. Juniors and Seniors should check ISIS after that for availability.

(Fall) History of Life with Lab - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Life forms have inhabited the surface of our planet for most of its history. Earth, as a result, has a unique geology that is unlike that of any other planet. In this course we will examine the interrelations between life processes and Earth's crust and atmosphere and how they work together to create the geology of the planet. Using both the rock and fossil record, we will study the origin and evolution of life, the history of continents and oceans, and the diversification of complex life forms. Laboratory and field trips will emphasize identification and analysis of sediments, rocks, and fossils.

GEOL-103-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Oceanography
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Because more than seventy percent of our planet is covered by oceans, the study of marine systems is crucial to our understanding of Earth History and life on the planet. We will examine chemical, physical, geological, and biological processes in the oceans at a variety of scales in time and space. We will explore how the Earth's oceans formed, how they provided the foundations for life, and how they continue to affect weather and climate, stabilize global chemical cycles, erode coastlines and provide access to resources. We will conclude the semester with a discussion of the human impact on the ocean environment including sea level rise, acidification, coral bleaching and over-fishing.

Prerequisites: Environmental Studies and Geology students should consider taking GEOL-123 concurrently with this course.

Instructors: A. Werner

GEOL-107-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Environmental Geology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The only planet known to sustain life, Earth provides all the resources that sustain us, yet at the same time it can be an unpredictable and sometimes dangerous home. Floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and other natural processes challenge our ingenuity, while we also contend with self-induced problems such as pollution, desertification, and even global climate change. This course examines earth processes, how these affect our lives, and how we can best live with and sustain our environment. May be taken for 200-level credit with permission of instructor.

Instructors: S. Dunn

Expected enrollment: 60

GEOL-108-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Precious Drops: The Geology of Groundwater and Fossil Fuels
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Are we running out of drinking water? Is fracking safe? When is peak oil? This course is a basic geology course that focuses on two earth materials we use every day: fresh water and fossil fuels. We cover where groundwater is found and why, the depletion and contamination of groundwater, and some major aquifers. We will also explore the formation, worldwide distribution, and extraction of coal, oil, and natural gas. This course introduces students to physical and historical geology, focusing particularly on plate tectonics and sedimentary basins, with attention to current events and illustrations from around the world.

Instructors: M. Markley

Expected enrollment: 59

GEOL-109-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) History of Life
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Life forms have inhabited the surface of our planet for most of its history. Earth, as a result, has a strange geology unlike that of any other known planet. In this course we will examine the interrelations between life processes and Earth's crust and atmosphere, and how these relationships interact to generate the geology of the planet. By means of hands-on analysis of rocks and fossils, we will study the origin and evolution of life, the diversification of complex life forms, the appearance of large predators, and the causes and consequences of oxygenation of the atmosphere.

GEOL-115-01 - Geology - 2016-2017

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Art in Paleontology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Paleontological art brings ancient organisms back to life. In this course we will consider the role that art itself plays as a mode of scientific discovery. We will examine how artists can uncover key information about prehistoric life well in advance of its recognition by the scientific community. Coursework will track the evolution of paleoart from 1830s representations of Mary Anning's fossil discoveries to the emergence of digital art and CGI. In a collaborative class project, we will identify the best and most representative works for a proposed exhibition at the Mount Holyoke College Museum of Art. For individual final class projects, students may choose between a research paper and presentation, and their own paleontological artwork in any visual medium.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: M. McMenamin
Expected enrollment: 16

GEOL-115-01 - Geology - 2016-2017

(Spring) First-Year Seminar: Emergence of Animals
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
The origin of animals was perhaps the most important event in the history of our planet. In this course we will review the history of Earth, learn basic geology, and then examine the problem of the origin of animals by studying Mount Holyoke College's unequaled collection of Precambrian and Cambrian fossils. The emergence of animals has been called the Cambrian Explosion. We will examine what this means for our understanding of evolution, and review the hypotheses proposed to explain this extraordinary event.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: M. McMenamin

GEOL-115-02 - Geology - 2016-2017

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Climate Change: Myth or Reality
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar
Described by some as "...the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people," and "the most important environmental issue of our time" by others, climate change has become a significant polarizing issue in our society. This course examines the science of climate change. How does the climate system work, what do we know about past (geologic) climate change and what is the evidence that humans are warming the planet? What are the implications of a warmer world?
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: A. Werner
Expected enrollment: 16

GEOL-123-01 - Geology - 2016-2017

(Fall) Methods in Earth Science
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course provides a hands-on introduction to earth science and methods in geology, and it augments all the 100-level geology courses. Students will learn the fundamental tools of the trade and explore local geology on field trips. Interactive laboratory work will include projects on groundwater quality, landfill siting, geologic hazards, and earth materials. Students will also develop skills in reading topographic and geologic maps.
Prerequisites: Any 100-level geology course (may be taken concurrently)
Notes: Several field trips are required.
Instructors: P. Taylor, M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 32

GEOL-131-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
Understanding hydrology (the distribution and movement of water at the earth's surface) is critical for resource management and climate modeling. With an eye toward these applications, we will use observational data to explore the components of the water cycle (precipitation, evapotranspiration, soil moisture, and streamflow) and the physical processes that govern them. Lectures and hands-on computer exercises are aimed at students with interests in earth and environmental science or data science. No previous experience is necessary. Students will receive an introduction to statistics, computer programming, data visualization techniques, and available environmental data sources.

Expected enrollment: 16

GEOL-201-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Rocks and Minerals
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
In this course you will learn to recognize the common rock-forming minerals and principal rock types, and to understand their origins, properties, associations, and geological significance. Observational skills and hand sample identification will be emphasized in lab and on field trips. Students must have either a one-year high school earth science class or any 100- or 200-level geology course or Geography 107. One or more field trips required.

GEOL-202-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) History of Earth
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course explores the evolution and interaction of life, rocks, oceans, and air during the past 4 billion years of earth history. Some topics covered are: ice ages and greenhouse atmospheres, continental drift, extinctions and radiations of flora and fauna, the early evolution of earth, absolute and relative dating of rocks, and the geologic time scale. Oral presentations and writing assignments focus on the design and testing of earth science hypotheses, critical analysis of recently published research on earth history, and proposal writing. The final exam involves memorization of the geologic time scale and significant events in earth history.
Prerequisites: GEOL-123. May be taken concurrently with permission of instructor.
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-203-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Surface Processes
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The surface of the Earth is a history book of past environmental change. Every hill and valley, every erosional feature and every deposit is the result of processes acting at the Earth's surface. In this course we study these processes (e.g. glaciers, rivers, slopes, coastlines, and regions, frozen ground, cave formation, soil development, and groundwater) to understand how they work and to understand the resulting landforms and deposits. With this understanding we can then observe different landforms and deposits and infer past processes (environments of deposition). Field work and trips allow students to explore first-hand the processes that have created and modified the Earth's surface.
Prerequisites: GEOL-123

Expected enrollment: 26

GEOL-210-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Plate Tectonics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Plate tectonic theory explains the origins of volcanoes and earthquakes, continental drift, and the locations of mountain belts and oceans. This course focuses on the geometry of plate tectonics. Topics include mid-ocean ridge systems, transform faults, subduction zones, relative plate motion, earthquake analysis, triple point junctions, and stereographic projection. Work includes individual research projects on active plate boundaries.
Notes: Comfort with geometry and trigonometry required.
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-211-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Uranium - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
From the A-bomb to zircon, uranium has revolutionized humanity's destructive potential and wisdom about time. Uranium is the planet's heaviest naturally occurring element, and it transforms by both radioactive decay and nuclear fission. This course uses computer modeling to explore these two transformations and what we make of them, specifically: the age of the earth, high-precision dating of recent geologic and climate events, nuclear power, nuclear weapons, plutonium production, and the uniquely long-term challenge of nuclear waste disposal and storage.

Prerequisites: Any course in Chemistry, Geology, Math, or Statistics
Instructors: M. Markley
Expected enrollment: 18

GEOL-224-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Paleontology-Stratigraphy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an intensive study of fossils, fossil preservation, relationships between major groups of organisms, depositional environments, sediments, sedimentary rocks, and the processes of sedimentation. We will employ the principles of stratigraphic analysis and correlation to interpret ancient environments and paleoclimate, reconstruct paleogeography, and probe the characteristics of sedimentary basins. Laboratory exercises and field trips will introduce a variety of analytical techniques used to study sedimentary rocks.
Prerequisites: GEOL-123

Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-227-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Groundwater - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
The demand for and the contamination of groundwater resources are major environmental concerns. To better understand the dynamics of the groundwater system, we will cover topics including the hydrologic cycle, surface and subsurface hydrology, groundwater resource evaluation, and groundwater geotechnical problems. Students are required to prepare weekly problem sets/labs, a term paper, and an oral presentation.
Prerequisites: Any 100-level geology course
Instructors: A. Werner
Section Instructors: 01 LAB A Werner
Expected enrollment: 15

GEOL-240-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Geological Resources and the Environment
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course surveys the geology and exploitation of important mineral deposits and energy resources. We will discuss factors that govern the economics of their production and the environmental implications of their extraction and use.
Prerequisites: Any geology course or concurrent enrollment in GEOL-123
Instructors: S. Dunn
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-295-01 - Geology - 2016-2017

GEOL-316-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Scanning Electron Microscopy
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Chemical Sciences 316)
Includes theory and operation of the scanning electron microscope and preparation of biological and geological materials for observation. The versatile use of the microscope will be emphasized and will include low magnification, high resolution, and back scattered (reflected) electron modes of operation as well as operation at different pressures. Energy dispersive X-ray microanalysis will be introduced.
Prerequisites: 4 credits of biological sciences or geology course at the 200 level
Instructors: B. Carbajal-Gonzalez

GEOL-322-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Igneous and Metamorphic Petrology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course covers mineralogical and chemical compositions, classification, genesis, and mode of occurrence of igneous and metamorphic rocks, including relationships between rock-forming processes and global plate tectonics; labs involve the study of representative rock suites in hand specimen and thin section, introduction to analytical techniques and in-depth coverage of mineral optics. One or more field trips required.
Prerequisites: Geology 201 and Chemistry 101. Chemistry 101 may be taken concurrently.
Instructors: S. Dunn

Expected enrollment: 15

GEOL-326-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar: Global Climate Change - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Earth's dynamic climate system is rapidly changing. This course will introduce you to the science behind climate change predictions as they apply to past, present, and future changes in our earth's climate. We will also discuss how, over the course of time, we adapted to these changing conditions with a specific focus on water resources and natural disasters, including floods, droughts, and hurricanes that have been predicted to intensify in response to ongoing climate change.
Prerequisites: 1 200-level Geology or Environmental Studies course
Expected enrollment: 19

GEOL-333-01 - Geology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Structural Geology and Orogenesis - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course covers the basic techniques of field geology and structural analysis. Lectures concentrate on field techniques, stress, strain, faulting, folding, rock strength, deformation mechanisms, and multidisciplinary approaches to mountain building (orogenesis). Many labs are field trips that involve data collection. Weekly writing assignments focus on presenting original research and distinguishing between observations and interpretations. During the final weeks of the semester, oral presentations emphasize fluency in the published literature of structural geology using a case study from Death Valley, California.
Prerequisites: Geology 123 and 201. 201 may be taken concurrently.
Instructors: M. Markley

(Fall) Getting Ahead in Geology and Geography
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Geography 399)
This course provides support and mentoring for geology and geography majors as they pursue internships, summer jobs, independent research, and careers. Experiences will include: resume and communication workshops; self-reflection and sharing opportunities for students returning from internships, work experiences, and semesters abroad; guidance on preparing for, selecting, and applying to graduate school; information about careers in education and teacher licensure; and discussion of new research in geology and geography.
Prerequisites: Geology or Geography Major or Minor
Notes: Course meets on Fridays just after the "Earth Adventures at Lunch" talks.
Instructors: P. Taylor, M. Markley

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Remembering as Reconciliation in the Wake of Violence
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Taught in English)
We explore how memorialization and reconciliation take place in societies that have experienced extreme violence. How do survivors, perpetrators and their descendants record the experience of atrocity through testimonials and memorials in ways that contrast with “official” national narratives of the past? In what ways does memorialization end cycles of violence without re-triggering trauma? How does restorative justice, for example, address feelings of despair or guilt that get passed down from one generation to another? Our transnational study will include examples from Germany, Japan, Rwanda, and Cambodia primarily, with other examples included based on student interest.

(Fall) German for Internships and Research
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
For students who wish to acquire a working knowledge of German to prepare for an internship or research in a German-speaking country. Some knowledge of German affords students access to better placements in internships, especially DAAD RISE summer internships (http://www.daad.de/rise/en/rise-germany/) sponsored and supported by the German government. Focus on vocabulary and structures used when interacting with German speakers in specific cultural contexts or discipline-specific situations. Help with applications and resumes, along with presentations and staff from the CDC, McCulloch Center, and Alumnae Association.

GRMST-201-01 - German Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Intermediate German
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course emphasizes further development of contextual reading, writing, and speaking skills in German. Focus on strategies that help students learn vocabulary and use grammatical structures in appropriate ways. Discussion of a variety of texts and genres, as well as exploration of topics such as immigration and social justice. Frequent writing assignments and speaking opportunities.

(Fall) Europe on the Edge: Introduction to European Studies
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English)
Europe embodies crossroads of multiple cultures, memories, migrations, and political demarcations. Taking a critical view of conventional paradigms of European nation states and "master" narratives, we study shifting European cultures and identities through multiple perspectives across time and space. What remains of the ancient and modern regimes? How have global movements, historical upheavals, and shifting boundaries within and adjacent to European borders from early empires to contemporary global networks affected the transformation of lives? Where is Europe heading today? Faculty from across the disciplines will join us to discuss Europe as a subject of global imagination and networks.

Notes: This course is designed for students eager to expand their knowledge of globalization, cultural politics, identity formation, and critical social thought. Students are encouraged to combine this course with the study of one or more European languages and cultures, International Relations, film and media studies, translation studies, or other courses dedicated to transnational perspectives.

Instructors: K. Remmler

(Spring) Lesen, Schreiben, Sprechen
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Intensive practice in reading, writing, and speaking German. Students will write short essays on topics of their choosing, in addition to application letters and a sample résumé for an internship or job in Germany. We will focus also on developing reading strategies and on improving students' ability to converse colloquially, idiomatically, and formally in German. Readings on popular culture, music, as well as current political, social, cultural, historical, and economic issues in the German-speaking world, reflecting student interest and academic focus. Students engage in a variety of speaking activities such as presentations, role-playing and simulations, pair work, and group discussions.
Prerequisites: German Studies 201

(Spring) German Culture Today: Stories and Histories
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course examines historical, cultural, and political developments that continue to frame debates about the twentieth century, World War II, the former GDR, and German unification. Thematic focus helps students develop accuracy, fluency, and complexity of expression. Reading, writing, and speaking are consistently integrated. Special emphasis is placed on text organization toward expanding students' language abilities, with a gradual movement from personal forms of expression to written and public discourse.
Prerequisites: Previous study of German, normally equivalent to 3 semesters of college German, or 3 or more years of high school German
Notes: Taught in German

Instructors: N. Gortcheva

Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) Topics in German Studies: In Flux: Germany, Migration, and the Other
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Spanning the period from the 1950s to today, we investigate the shifting notions of national and cultural identity in East, West, and reunified Germany. We study both the history of migration as well as debates on German citizenship, nationhood and belonging to the society. The seminar combines philosophical texts, newspaper articles, literary materials, and films with public discussions and personal reflections on the topics of the seminar. Students are introduced to literary and film analysis, and encouraged to draw on current events which manifest anew Germany's complex role in a globalized world.
Prerequisites: Previous study of German, normally equivalent to 3 semesters of college German, or 3 or more years of high school German.
Notes: Taught in German.

Instructors: N. Gortcheva

(Spring) Topics in German Studies: From Flaneur to Hipster: Berlin in Text and Film
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Since its rapid rise as a European and world metropolis in the late nineteenth century, Berlin has drawn both continuous fascination and criticism. The city has served as a playground for conflicting forces and become a symbol of Germany’s and Europe’s complicated path in the twentieth and twenty-first century. This class provides snapshots of Berlin’s fascinating landscape from the 1900s to the present through a wide range of emblematic figures (the flaneur, the prostitute, the urban youth, the rebel, the hipster, etc.) at various sites of urban exploration.
Prerequisites: Previous study of German, normally equivalent to 3 semesters of college German, or 3 or more years of high school German.
Notes: Taught in German
Instructors: N. Gortcheva

(Spring) Topics in German and European Studies in a Global Context: Embodiment in Theory: Precarious Lives from Marx to Butler
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive; Taught in English; Critical Social Thought 249EM, Gender Studies 204EM)
We examine the writing of major nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first century theorists, such as Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, DuBois, Arendt, Fanon, Foucault, Butler, and others through the lens of embodiment. Rather than read theory as an abstract entity, we explore how theory itself is an embodiment of actual lives in which human beings experience life as precarious. What are the social conditions that create vulnerable bodies? How do thinkers who lived or are living precarious lives represent these bodies? Through a series of case studies based on contemporary examples of precarity, we examine the legacy and materiality of critical social thought.

(Spring) A Global Enterprise: Germany Works - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English)
Students will explore how the humanities and social sciences contribute to our understanding of the changing role of work from a historical perspective. We will investigate how the concept of 'work' affects social organization and individual identity formation. By concentrating on the nineteenth and twenty-first centuries within the German speaking countries and beyond, the seminar will shed light on the two eras when technological changes and their concomitant transformations in social and individual organization brought disruptive change to our notions of 'work.'
We will focus our attention on 'work' by literary scholars, artists, and philosophers who often work in cross-disciplinary research networks.

(Spring) Topics in German Studies: German Culture from 1800 to 2000: Remembering the Holocaust in the Digital Age
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
The access to digital equipment has created a boom in transgenerational remembering of the Holocaust and its aftermath. Descendants of survivors, perpetrators, and bystanders in Germany and Austria continue to create documentaries about their family histories. We explore the motivation behind the making of these documentaries and other digital renditions of Holocaust narrative. How effective are they in contrast to more static forms of remembering, such as memorials, museums, and documentation centers? Students create a media project to complement their research papers.

(Fall) Topics in German and European Studies in a Global Context: European Film in Global Context
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Film Studies 370EF)
Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.
This class addresses films which deal with European identity and experience in a global perspective. The concepts of "inside" and "outside" guide the discussion in a broad national, racial, ethnic, gender and generational context. The class tackles various genres and exhibition platforms, deepens the students' command of film analysis, and revisits key aspects of film style and form.
Notes: Evening screenings are mandatory. The course is taught in English and all the films have English subtitles. Students may receive German credit if they register for German Studies 331 and complete their assignments in German.

(Fall) Foundation: Jack the Ripper and the Making of late-Victorian London
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
In the summer and fall of 1888, a series of gruesome murders captured the attention of Londoners and brought questions of class, gender, race and social-economic change to the forefront of public debate. Though the culprit was never identified, Jack the Ripper became synonymous with the perceived dangers of late-Victorian London. Using newspapers, periodicals, police archives, and other sources from the period, this course will set students on an historical investigation of the “Whitechapel Murders,” seeking to understand the event, its historical context, and the way historians have interpreted its meaning.

(Fall) Foundation: Women, Politics, and Activism in U.S. History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
On what basis have women claimed the authority to speak and to lead? From the founding of the United States to its arrival as a superpower, women have taken it upon themselves to act on their visions of a just—or a righteous—world. Some have gained entry into the halls of power, some have petitioned or agitated for change, others have planted their feet on colonized ground and stood against the injustices they felt and saw. How did they persuade others and move them to action? What historical circumstances aided or impeded their efforts? This course addresses conflicting perspectives within women’s politics, with attention to the histories of racism, radicalism, and conservatism.

(Fall) History of Modern South Asia, 1700 to the Present - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
This course will explore the history of South Asia between the eighteenth century and the present. Using a combined chronological and thematic approach and against a historical canvas that engages such diverse issues as gender, political economy, conquest, resistance, state formation, economic exploitation, national liberation, and identity politics, the aim of this course is to interrogate the impact of British colonialism and South Asian nationalism on the state, society, and people of the subcontinent. Using primary and secondary sources, we will address both the most significant historical moments of modern South Asian history and the historiographical debates that surround them.

HIST-137-01 - History - 2016-2017
(Fall) Modern East Asia, 1600-2000
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
A comparative history of China, Japan, and Korea from the early seventeenth century to the present, with strong focus on regional interaction. After an introduction to early modern histories and cultures, we will examine the struggles of these countries to preserve or regain their independence and establish their national identities in a rapidly changing, often violent modern world order. While each of these countries has its own distinctive identity, their overlapping histories (and dilemmas) give the region a coherent shape. We will also look at how individuals respond to and are shaped by larger historical movements.
Notes: no prior knowledge of East Asian history or the languages is required, and readings are all in English.

HIST-138-01 - History - 2016-2017
(Fall) Modern Jewish History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Jewish Studies 138)
A history of the Jews from the 16th century to the present. Jews--a small group, lacking a stable geographical or political center--played a remarkably central role in world events. Jewish history exemplifies questions of tolerance, intolerance, and diversity in the Modern Age. From Europe to the Americas to the Middle East, Jewish history witnessed constant interchange between the non-Jewish world and its Jewish subcultures. We will examine a variety of Jewish encounters with the modern world: integration, assimilation, anti-Semitism, and Jewish nationalism. The course will also contextualize the Holocaust, and the establishment of the State of Israel, as well as contemporary Jewish life.

(Spring) British Empire and Commonwealth
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
This course is an introduction to the expansion, consolidation, and eventual disintegration of the modern British Empire in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. We will examine this history with an eye to understanding the causes of empire, and its effects. Themes include formal and informal imperialism, the emergence of anti-colonial nationalism, the roles of gender and culture, and the legacies of British colonialism. We will discuss British attitudes and policies toward empire, and toward particular colonies, what role empire played in the growth of the British economy, in short, how colonial ideologies and practices were shaped and in turn affected vast regions of the globe.

(Spring) The American Peoples since 1865
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course introduces the history of the United States from Reconstruction to the present. Our themes include the nation’s relationship to the world; the evolution of racial, gendered, and class hierarchies; the transformation of the federal government; and the changing forms of domestic life, work, consumer capitalism, politics, social protest, and cultural expression. How have the people of the United States struggled over such values as freedom, equality, prosperity, and progress? How have ideas about citizenship, manhood, and motherhood served to police the boundaries of national belonging? We will be concerned throughout with the role of storytelling in history.

(Spring) African Cities: Development Dreams and Nightmares in the Twentieth Century
(African Studies 206)
African cities demonstrate the failure of models of development with the aim and ideal of industrialization. This course examines the empty promises of modernity through the lens of African urban history using fiction, film, and city archives. Beginning with Timbuctu and Cairo, the course explores the emergence and decline of trade entrepots, the rise of colonial cities, and the dilemmas of postcolonial economies and polities. Dar es Salaam, Nairobi, Kampala, Kinshasa, Harare, Johannesburg, Lagos, Accra, and Dakar are among the cities studied. Designed for those seeking only an introduction to development as well as those with further ambitions, it assumes no previous knowledge of Africa.

(Spring) Religion and Politics in Modern India
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Religion 223)
The history of India has been singled out for its complex intermingling of religion and politics. This course will explore the constitution of religious identities in two of India’s largest religious communities: Hindu and Muslim. Focusing primarily on the colonial period, we will discuss religious reform movements, communal violence, mass politics, and the partition of the subcontinent into the independent states of India and Pakistan. Throughout we will be interested in the ways that the colonial experience affected the religious thought and practice of Indians. Finally, we will explore the meanings of this history for the postcolonial workings of democracy and secularism in modern India.

(Writing-intensive)
Centered on great powers in the web of the Silk Roads prior to the nineteenth century, this course seeks to present a history of incessant communication at a trans-regional level. Three vast empires dominated the heart of the Eurasian continent: the Tibetan empire (7th-9th centuries), the Mongol empire (1206-1370), and the Manchu Qing (1644-1911). Each of them cultivated and encouraged cultural exchanges in the landlocked regions that are now divided into many modern nation-states. Important questions include: is seaborne trade the only form of global circulation of knowledge? What roles did the great powers play in facilitating exchange and communication?

(Spring) Bread and Circuses: The Politics of Public Entertainment in Ancient Rome - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Classics 226)
"Bread and circuses" (panem et circenses) was a catchphrase in the Roman empire that described the political strategy of controlling an unruly populace through free bread and public entertainment. Against a backdrop of Roman social and political institutions, this course focuses on the imperial ideology, aristocratic ethos, and cultural practices that underpinned this catchphrase, as well as questions concerning the careers of entertainers--gladiators, charioteers, and actors--who were at once celebrities and social outcasts; the rules of spectatorship at the games; the use of these games as a form of social control; and the logistics of feeding the city population.

HIST-227-01 - History - 2016-2017
(Fall) Ancient Greece
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Classics 227)
This course will trace the emergence and expansion of Greek civilization in the Mediterranean between the Bronze Age and Alexander the Great. Among themes to be explored are political structures, trade, slavery, gender relations, and religion, as well as the contributions of ancient Greeks to literary genres (drama, rhetoric, historiography, philosophy) and to the visual arts. Throughout we will consider how the history of the ancient Greeks can speak to modern concerns. Sources will include works of ancient Greek literature and history (e.g., Homer, Herodotus, Thucydides, Aristophanes, Plutarch) as well as archaeological and epigraphic evidence.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Classics 228)
Ancient Rome and its empire can be viewed both as a measure of human achievement and a cautionary tale of the corrupting effects of unbridled power. This course covers the history of Ancient Rome from its mythologized beginnings (753 BCE) to the rise and spread of Christianity under the Emperor Constantine (312 CE). Topics include the creation and development of Rome's republican form of government as well as its eventual transition to monarchy, the causes and consequences of the acquisition of empire, the role of the army in administering the provinces and defending the frontiers, the image of emperor, the economy, and religion.

(Spring) The Tyrant and the Gladiator: Bad Roman Emperors from Caligula to Commodus
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Classics 229)
Caligula was a god (or so he thought); Nero fiddled while Rome burned; Commodus dressed as a gladiator and fought man and beast in the arena. The history of the Roman empire is replete with scandalous stories about eccentric and even insane emperors whose reigns raise questions about the nature of the emperor's power and his role in administering the empire. In this course a close study of Roman imperial biography and historiography--the source of so many of these stories of bad emperors--will be weighed against documentary and archaeological evidence in order to reveal the dynamic between the emperor, his court, and his subjects that was fundamental to the political culture of imperial Rome.

(Spring) Native American History through 1865
(Environmental Studies 237)
This course surveys Native American history from ancient times through the U.S. Civil War, tracing the ways that tribal communities have shaped North America. Beginning with the diverse indigenous societies that inhabited the Americas millennia before Columbus's arrival, it discusses the cultural complexity of Native peoples, nations, and worldviews rooted in particular ecosystems and homelands. It moves through the early modern era of European scientific exploration and "discovery" of a New World, and the pivotal violences of the "Indian Wars" of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and early nineteenth centuries.

(Spring) European Public Policy, West and East - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
In 1968, the USSR terminated the Prague Spring, and commenced a strategy of consumerist depoliticization in its European satellites. Around the same time, states on the other side of the Iron Curtain saw the postwar "miracle" of rapid economic growth and social consensus come to an end. This course, reaching across the revolutionary break of 1989 up to the present, raises questions of convergence and continuity in European public policy, West and East. Paired case studies from a variety of countries in fields such as energy and the environment, minority rights, and housing serve to clarify evolving rules and patterns to the policy-making game, from Cold War to European Union.

(Spring) Science, Revolution, and Modernity
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Critical Social Thought 248)
Introduces critical analysis of science and technology by tracing the historiography of the Scientific Revolution. The significance of this extended intellectual episode has been assessed in radically different ways throughout the intervening centuries. As such, it provides a fertile ground on which to pose and answer important questions about science and its role in society. What does it mean to regard science as "revolutionary"? How are scientific developments shaped by, and how do they shape, the social, economic, and political worlds in which they are embedded? How is our contemporary understanding of science and technology influenced by the stories we tell about the past?

HIST-251-01 - History - 2016-2017
(Spring) The City and Economic Life in Modern South Asia
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
One-third of South Asia's population, or approximately 500 million people, currently live and work in cities. This course explores the history of urban life in the subcontinent from the mid-eighteenth century to the present. Cities have long been sites of economic opportunity, but also of profound inequality. They offer a unique spatial perspective on large-scale transformations such as industrialization and globalization. The course addresses the ongoing challenges of mass urbanization, especially the negotiation of ethnic, class, gender, and religious differences. Readings drawn from history, anthropology, and urban studies accompany literary and visual primary sources.
Instructors: M. Raianu

HIST-252-01 - History - 2016-2017
(Spring) History of Money and Finance
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
What is money? Is it the same in all times and places? If money could speak, what stories would it tell of the past? This course is about the history of money and money as an object of history. Using primary and secondary sources, students will learn about the social, political and cultural meaning of money at different times in the history of the western world. In addition, students will interpret the history of money using a variety of coins and money-related objects held in the MHC Art Museum. This is a course on the history of money, not the economics of money, but it will be of interest to anyone curious to learn more about the meaning of money in the past and today.

(Fall) Topics in the Recent History of Europe: Postwar Societies: USSR and Eastern Europe
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Russian and Eurasian Studies 244PW)
What was it like to be a hipster in the Soviet Union? What does rock music have to do with political dissent? This course offers a critical inquiry into the fascinating and vibrant societies of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe from 1945 to 1989, with a focus on the former. While gaining an understanding of the major political developments from late Stalinism to the end of Communism, we will explore the creative ways in which citizens of the Eastern bloc expressed their agency and initiated societal change. Using a range of primary and secondary sources, including film and literature, we will study themes such as postwar childhood, fashion, music, political dissent, and environmentalism.

HIST-260-BK - History - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in the Recent History of Europe: Balkan Histories in Modern Times
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The Balkans, Winston Churchill famously said, "produce more history than they can consume." This course offers an introduction to the complex histories of this little-known yet diverse and fascinating part of Europe that has been subject to many myths. Starting in the eighteenth century, we will focus on the emergence of modern Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Albania and end our journey in the late twentieth century. Using a broad range of primary and secondary sources we will study historical themes such as Habsburg and Ottoman imperial rule, religion, nationalism, identity politics, social and economic transformation, ethnic conflict, and European integration.
Instructors: C. Roeder

(Spring) Topics in the Recent History of Europe: The Cold War: Perspectives from East and West
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(RES-244CW)
This course provides a comprehensive introduction to the social, cultural, and political history of both Western and Eastern Europe since 1945. By exploring the permeability of the "Iron Curtain," the course encourages students to critically assess conceptions of division and unity in European history. We will explore ways in which borders were both reinforced and transcended. Topics include the legacy of the Second World War, migration, science, the division of Germany and its re-unification, tourism and the experience of the "other," sport as a unifying culture, the power of media, social protest, transatlantic relations, and the end of the Cold War.

HIST-262-01 - History - 2016-2017
(Fall) Stalinism in Central Europe - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course explores the use of revolutionary terror by the state. More specifically, it examines policies of terror pursued by Communist dictatorships in Hungary and Czechoslovakia during the early years of the Cold War. Who did what to whom, and why? What insights do secret police work and public propaganda, knitted together in macabre show trials, allow us into Stalinist rule, European politics, and maybe ourselves? How did memories of terror shape politics after Stalin's death? Students should deepen their understanding for the discipline of History, improve their reading and writing, and develop a working knowledge of Central European politics at the middle of the twentieth century.

(Spring) Place and Power in the American West and Pacific World
(Environmental Studies 271)
The vast region of North America between the Mississippi River and Pacific Ocean has been a site of many migrations, conflicts, political transformations, and environmental changes. This course examines dynamic histories of Native American tribes, Euro-American "explorers" and colonists, cowboys and miners, Asian immigrant laborers, and mariners, all of whom helped create interior and oceanic worlds. It focuses on natural and human changes in specific locales, and also explores how public histories at these places shape the present and future.

(Spring) Topics in North American History: The Culture of Civil Rights
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; AFCNA-241CV)
Students will examine the cultural history of African American political resistance from the early to middle twentieth century. We will study the various art forms that people of African descent have employed to assert their humanity, preserve their identity, and critique oppression of race, class, gender, and sexuality. Fiction, poetry, film, music, theater, memoir, aesthetics, and athletics are the creative devices that we will explore. We will mine the complex cultures of the seminal places and organizations recognized as having played crucial roles in the long black freedom struggle. We will also probe the political contributions and legacies of leading African American cultural figures.

(Fall) Topics in the Recent History of the United States: The United States since 1945: We Didn’t Start the Fire
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): These courses are designed for students with a background in American history who wish to focus attention on developments since the late nineteenth century.
The United States emerged from the Second World War as the most powerful nation on earth. This course explores American political, cultural, and social life in the postwar period, with an eye toward helping students gain a firmer understanding of contemporary issues and conflicts in our nation and around the world. Topics include birth of the national security state, the Cold War at home and abroad, popular culture and consumer society, the civil rights struggle, the political and cultural rebellions of the 1960s, the resurgence of conservatism, and America's changing relationship to the world in the post Cold War era. Students will have the opportunity to do a research paper on the topic of their choice.

(Latin American Studies 260, Africana 241AF)
Exploration of the history of Afro-Latin American populations since Independence within and outside the nation-state. We will question why and how to study those whose governments define them not as peoples of African descent but as part of a mixed-race majority of Hispanic cultural heritage, who themselves may often have supported this policy, and who may have had compelling reasons to avoid official scrutiny. Readings include early twentieth-century Latin American racialist theorizing; research using census, economic, criminal, and marriage records; autobiographical works, and analysis of race in textual and musical representations of peoples, regions, and nations.

(Fall) Colloquium: The Indian Ocean World - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking-intensive)
In recent years, the Indian Ocean has become an exciting field of historical scholarship, contributing to new understandings of Indian and world history. This colloquium explores trade and travel, conquest, religious conversion, and migration across a large area, from East Africa to the islands of Southeast Asia. Its purpose will be to understand a complex and integrated commercial system, pivoted on the Indian subcontinent, by considering movements of goods and people across the Indian Ocean.

(Fall) Colloquium: History of Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Environmental Studies 301)
We live in an age of energy crises, in which the future of energy is questioned in countless headlines and Twitter feeds. Often our energy agony accompanies other assumptions about energy’s past, in particular the idea that social change invariably follows the discovery of new energy technologies. From food to fuel cells, this colloquium charts a more complicated and interesting history, a history in which people have continually shaped and made meaningful the energies that fuel the modern world. It will be of particular interest to students in history and environmental studies and to those interested in the social study of science and technology.

(Spring) Colloquium: Women and the Family in Imperial China
(Writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333WF)
This course examines the lives of women in imperial China (221 BCE-1911). How did Confucian didactic texts define women and their place in the family? Seen as the core of the family in a patrilineal, patriarchal, and patriarchal society, men prescribed women's roles in family life. How did women understand and respond to the social expectations imposed on them? What changed over the long history of imperial China? Students consider writings by and about women alongside the evidence of material culture.

(Spring) Colloquium: African Americans and Sports
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; AFCNA-341SP)
Students will explore the critical role that athletes and black sports figures have played in debates about racial uplift, citizenship, civil rights, gender norms, and sexuality from the late nineteenth century through the present. Our task will be to examine amateur, collegiate, and professional sports as sites where social markers of race, class, gender, and sexuality have been constructed. The class will investigate the black experience in sports for its intrinsic connections to the history of advancement, exclusion, and identity formation for people of African descent in the United States.

(Fall) Perspectives on American Environmental History - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Environmental Studies 317)
We explore the history of human-environment interactions in North America from precolonial times to the present from different cultural perspectives. How have such human activities as migration, colonization, and resource use depended on or modified the natural world? How have different cultural perceptions of and attitudes toward environment shifted through time and helped to reshape American landscapes? Case studies include ecological histories of Native America and Euro-America, slavery and land use, wilderness and conservation, and environmental racism and social justice. Our approach entails historical review of scientific studies, literature, visual records, and oral tradition.

(Spring) Topics in African History: Power and Exchange in the African Past
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
(African Studies 341PW)
Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.
Did African nations become poorer in the 20th century because development initiatives were badly executed, inherently exploitative, ill-timed? Looking beyond the caricatures of evil colonial officers, lazy peasants, or greedy elites, who do we see engaged in productive activity and what are they doing? What concepts and categories illumine our understanding of their actions? How does a careful exploration of the nature of exchange and production in Africa revise our perception of the global economy in the present? We will explore three centuries of exchange in Africa and elsewhere: students may focus their research on the history of a market in any part of the world.
Prerequisites: 8 credits of history or other significant preparatory coursework relevant to the topic

(Spring) Thinking Mountains
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.

Throughout the modern period the way people engaged with mountains reflected the currents of political and cultural thought. This course engages the history of human-mountain relations to think transnationally about major historiographical themes of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries: modernity, nature, empire, class, nationalism, science, leisure, environmentalism, gender, climate change, and ideology. Following British tourists into the Alps and a German scientist into the Andes, we will leave the beaten track of history and find that mountains are "good to think with." Along the way students will conduct a research project and experience the joys and challenges of historical research.

(Fall) The Afterlives of Objects: Revisiting Early American and Indigenous Histories through Material Culture

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement

Material culture studies examine relationships between people and objects. Tangible artifacts like furniture, clothing, ceramics, tools, and buildings give insight into communities' identities, aspirations, and struggles. This course approaches early American and indigenous histories through objects, and considers how interdisciplinary methodologies can reveal alternative understandings of the past. The course traces changing theories and practices of preservation, curation, and display; shifting conceptions of "heritage" among diverse peoples; and ethical challenges posed by Native American items held in museums.

(Fall) International Human Rights - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides an introduction to the basic concepts of, and issues in, international human rights. Prior to World War II, there was very little focus on the question of human rights within the international system and within the discipline of international relations. Since that time we have seen a significant expansion of human rights theory, practice, and institutions. This course outlines the historical ideational and institutional developments of human rights. It exposes students to a range of theoretical propositions and empirical findings to understand the role (and limits) of human rights in the international system today.

(Spring) International Society - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
An intensive reading course in theories of international society: the idea that states and peoples are or should be linked to each other through a web of shared values and institutions. It focuses on the work of Hedley Bull, Immanuel Kant, and John Rawls. How did these three men understand international society? What are or should be the values and institutions that give rise to it and support it? What implications do their visions of international society have for war and peace, state sovereignty, religion, democracy, capitalism, distributive justice, human rights, and international law? What responses and criticisms have their arguments engendered?

(Spring) International Human Rights Advocacy in Theory and Practice - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This course examines how and why international human rights norms, laws, and institutions have emerged and how they are influencing global politics. We will examine closely the practices and influences of human rights advocacy organizations and the major international human rights political and judicial institutions. Students will be introduced to legal and political theories, advocacy strategies, and media technologies as well as a broad range of analytical approaches to evaluating advocacy campaigns. This class is linked (we share several class sessions and a final project) with Spanish 340: The Other in the Media: New Media and Otherness in the Americas.

IR-343-01 - International Relations - 2016-2017
(Spring) Law and Religion
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores the relationship between law and religion through a comparative study of eight countries: the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Egypt, Iran, Pakistan, Israel, and India. It focuses on the role of religion in the constitutional law of these countries, both in the text of constitutional documents and in judicial interpretation of these texts. Starting with an analysis of the religion clauses in the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, the seminar explores questions relating to the separation of religion and state, religious liberty, and the proper role of courts in negotiating societal disputes over religion.
Prerequisites: Politics 116
Instructors: S. Hashmi

(Spring) The Instrument of the Curious: Photography as Social Exploration
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
When thoughtfully and responsibly employed, the photographic craft affords practitioners a passport to the world; an excuse to closely explore issues and spaces of interest. This course uses photography to examine relationships between conflict, masculine gender, and broader social order. By drawing on the extensive body of work of the instructor, a photojournalist who has contributed to National Geographic Magazine and other leading outlets, as well as fiction and non-fiction readings, it aims to illustrate the connection between academic concepts and modern storytelling. Thematically, the course will focus largely on issues of masculinity, violence, and contemporary armed conflict.

IR-365-01 - International Relations - 2016-2017
(Fall) Ethics and International Relations - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Do ethical considerations matter in international relations? Should they? These questions are examined from the perspective of Western writers on these specific issues: just war, intervention, human rights, weapons of mass destruction, and distributive justice. The course also considers challenges to the international system posed by the critiques and responses of non-Western states and peoples.
Prerequisites: Politics 116, 8 credits in international relations

(Spring) Introduction to Judaism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(religion 112)
Judaism is a 3,500-year-old tradition that has developed over time as Jewish communities all over the world creatively interacted with the different cultural and historical milieus in which they lived. This course explores the ways in which Judaism has sought to transform ordinary life into sacred life. What are the ways in which Judaism conceives of God, and what is the meaning of life? What roles do study, prayer, ethics, sex, marriage, family, rituals of the life cycle, and community play in Judaism? These and other questions will be taken up through study of diverse types of religious literature and historical evidence.

JWST-138-01 - Jewish Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Modern Jewish History
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 138)
A history of the Jews from the 16th century to the present. Jews—a small group, lacking a stable geographical or political center—played a remarkably central role in world events. Jewish history exemplifies questions of tolerance, intolerance, and diversity in the Modern Age. From Europe to the Americas to the Middle East, Jewish history witnessed constant interchange between the non-Jewish world and its Jewish subcultures. We will examine a variety of Jewish encounters with the modern world: integration, assimilation, anti-Semitism, and Jewish nationalism. The course will also contextualize the Holocaust, and the establishment of the State of Israel, as well as contemporary Jewish life.
Instructors: A. Gordon

(Spring) Introduction to Jewish Mysticism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Religion 235)
Mysticism refers to a type of religious life in which individuals seek intimate and personal, direct and intense experience of the Divine. There exists a rich and fascinating Jewish mystical tradition with hundreds of books of diverse kinds. This course examines the Kabbalah of thirteenth-century Spain, focusing upon the seminal work of this period, the Zohar; the synthesis of mysticism and messianism that occurred in the city of Safed (in the Land of Israel) in the sixteenth century; and the popular pietistic movement of Eastern Europe from the eighteenth century forward, Hasidism; and various expressions of mystical spirituality in our own time.
Instructors: L. Fine
Expected enrollment: 18

JWST-250-01 - Jewish Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Intermediate Hebrew - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course emphasizes skills necessary for proficiency in reading, writing, and conversational Hebrew. It presents new grammatical concepts and vocabulary through texts about Jewish and Israeli culture and tradition, as well as popular culture and day-to-day life in modern Israel. Course material includes newspapers, films, music, and readings from Hebrew short stories and poetry. Starts a transition from simple/simplified Hebrew to a more literate one, and sharpens the distinction between different registers of the language.
Prerequisites: At least one year of college Hebrew or equivalent
Notes: Attendance will be required at a weekly Hebrew language table at either Mount Holyoke College or Smith College.
Instructors: J. Caravita
Expected enrollment: 18

(Fall) What Didn't Make It in the Bible - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Religion 256)
Hundreds of ancient religious texts did not make it into the Hebrew Scripture (aka the Old Testament). This course examines some of these excluded writings. In particular, we will focus on works found among the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, and the Dead Sea Scrolls. We will read an ancient Harlequin romance, tour heaven and hell, hear of the adventures of fallen angels who sired giants (and taught humans about cosmetics), and learn how the world will end. In critically examining such texts, we will better appreciate the diversity of Judaism, better understand the historical context of early Christianity, and explore the politics behind what did and did not make it into the bible.

(Fall) Jewish Religious Art and Material Culture: From Ancient Israel to Contemporary Judaism - Not offered this year/term

(Religion 270, Art History 290JR)

Despite the biblical prohibition against "graven images," there exists a rich history of Jewish religious art and aesthetics. This course will study ancient Israelite art and archeology, including the Second Temple in Jerusalem, the extraordinary mosaic floors and frescoes of early synagogues throughout the Mediterranean world, medieval illuminated Hebrew manuscripts and printed book culture, synagogues of later periods, including the wooden synagogues of Eastern Europe, and Judaic ritual objects of many types. Jewish art, architecture, and visual representation will be explored in the context of the ancient Near Eastern, Greco-Roman, Christian, and Islamic settings in which they evolved.

JWST-276-01 - Jewish Studies - 2016-2017

(Spring) Mapping Jewish American Generations

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(English 276)

This course sets canonical Jewish American literature in creative dialogue with contemporary Jewish American writers, filmmakers, and performance artists to explore how early twentieth-century figures (Abraham Cahan, Anzia Yezierska, and Henry Roth) continue to influence --inspire--a rising generation of authors. The key mediating figure in this generational dialogue is Philip Roth, whose work we will examine as well. Topics to be explored include "immigrant" writing then and now; the uses of nostalgia; genealogies of standup comedy and popular culture in general; the emergence of "hipster" Judaism and its various modes of expression (above all via social media).

Instructors: B. Arnold
Expected enrollment: 12

LATIN-210-01 - Latin - 2016-2017
(Spring) Ovid: Metamorphoses - *Not offered this year/term
A study of Ovid's ambitious epic celebrating change and transformative forces, with attention to the challenges it poses to traditional Roman values and to conventional Roman notions of the work appropriate to a poet. In particular, consideration will be given to the way Ovid's poem subversively responds to Vergil's work.

Prerequisites: one 200- or 300-level Latin course

Notes: Meets with 310. Three meetings per week; timing of third to be arranged with students after registration.

Instructors: B. Arnold

LATIN-225-01 - Latin - 2016-2017
(Spring) The Dido/Aeneas Story - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
Second-year level study of Latin with readings in prose and poetry focused around the Roman foundation myth of Dido and Aeneas, which can be read on many different levels: as a myth of the origins of Rome; as an historical allegory of the Punic wars and the later war against Cleopatra, Queen of the East; as a psychological analysis of romantic love; as moral and political philosophy; and as a classical tragedy with interesting allusions to several of the best Greek tragedies. Selections are from Vergil, Ovid, Livy and Pompeius Trogus. Offers further review of grammar and syntax.
Prerequisites: Latin 201
Instructors: B. Arnold

LATIN-302-01 - Latin - 2016-2017
(Fall) Cicero and the Enemies of the Roman Republic
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
The career of the Roman orator and statesman Marcus Tullius Cicero spanned the last generation of the Roman Republic, a period of political instability and civil war. As the leading orator of his day, Cicero often used his rhetorical skills to thwart those who he believed were bent on the destruction of the Roman Republic. In this course, we will examine the role of public oratory in the political process in this period with a close reading of Cicero's speeches and letters concerning one of his political enemies (Catiline, Clodius, or Mark Antony).
Prerequisites: one 200- or 300-level Latin course

(Fall) Roma Ludens: Comedy and Satire in Ancient Rome - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
Could Romans be funny? Perhaps surprisingly, in a culture where seriousness (gravitas) and sternness (severitas) were praiseworthy attributes, Romans enjoyed theatrical productions adapted from Greek comedies - from raucous and ribald farces to more subtle comedies of manners. They also believed that satire, poetry that poked fun at the vices and foibles of human nature, was a truly Roman genre. Moreover, both comic and satirical elements appear in a wide range of Roman literature. Authors may include Plautus, Terence, Horace, Ovid, Martial, Juvenal, and others.
Prerequisites: Latin 222
Instructors: P. Debnar

(Spring) Power, Politics, and Scandal: Roman Imperial Biography and Historiography - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
Tacitus and Suetonius are the two principal authorities for understanding the impact of the Roman emperor's position and authority on the transformation of the political culture of the early empire from republic to monarchy. This course will focus on the content of Roman imperial historiography and biography--politics and the abuse of power, dynastic succession, scandal and court intrigue--as well as its form--source material, narrative structure and prose style--by reading closely selections from Tacitus' Annals of Imperial Rome and/or Histories and Suetonius' Lives of the Twelve Caesars.
Prerequisites: Latin 222

Latin American Studies

LATAM-170-01 - Latin American Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Readings in Caribbean Literature
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
Features comparison of selected readings in the literature of the Spanish-, French-, and English-speaking Caribbean. Introduces the literary personality of the area, the transformation of the material of Caribbean social life into formally crafted and effective literary statement, and characteristic thematic and broader cultural preoccupations. Asks primary questions, such as "How does a novel—or poem—work?" and addresses similar issues related to forms of critical thinking and literary analysis. Readings and discussion in English.

(Fall) Introduction to Latin American Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 243)
Why has Latin America struggled to achieve democratic stability? Why is it the region of the world with the highest economic inequality? How have the periodic political and economic crises allowed for creative experimentation with policy alternatives to create a more equal and sustainable social order? This course examines the political and economic evolution and transformation of Latin America from the time of the European conquest until these very days, with a particular focus on the 20th century. It will also analyze how these general trends took specific shapes in each of the 7 countries studied: Mexico, Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Chile, Venezuela and Bolivia.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr. Politics 106 (Comparative Politics) is recommended.
Instructors: C. Fernandez-Anderson

(Fall) Topics in Latin American Studies: Frames of Mind: Tracking Power/Knowledge
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
A frame of mind typically refers to a mood or perspective. However, such dispositions also reflect a certain regulation of thought and thus behavior. In other words, something "frames" our minds in the first place. This course explores these ideas by interrogating the history of commonplace assumptions regarding issues such as freedom, race, prison, sexuality, government, and insanity. Authors include Giorgio Agamben, Wendy Brown, Michel Foucault, Friedrich Nietzsche, Edward Said, Ann Laura Stoler, and others.
Prerequisites: The course is geared toward both first-year students with minimal experience with philosophy and other students who have an interest in critical theory.
Instructors: J. Crumbaugh

(Spring) Topics in Latin American Studies: Rethinking (Under)Development in Latin America - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Critical Social Thought 256)
When and how did the notion of "development" emerge and spread? Why does nearly every country now aspire to it? What stigmas and hierarchies does the term "under-development" imply? Throughout Latin America, such terms prove highly problematic not only with respect to the material reality they purport to describe but also as a framework for understanding place, time, and selfhood. In this course, students rethink conventional wisdom about "underdevelopment" through the study of writers, filmmakers, and painters from Latin America working at different historical junctures of the twentieth century.

(Spring) Topics in Latin American Studies: Sexual and Reproductive Rights in Latin America
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; GNDST-250RP, POLIT-255RP)
Since the 1990s Latin America has witnessed increasing societal and political debates over sexual and reproductive rights. Issues such as abortion, gay marriage, transgender rights, sexual education and assisted reproductive technology have risen to the top of some countries' agendas after decades of silence, taboos, and restrictive or non-existent legislation. The course aims to provide a survey of sexual and reproductive rights in the region as a whole while at the same time highlighting the disparities that exist within it. The course analyzes the multiple factors behind the current policies focusing particularly on the role of women and LGBT movements advancing more liberal legislation.
Prerequisites: Previous coursework in Latin American Studies and/or Gender Studies recommended.
Instructors: C. Fernandez-Anderson

LATAM-288-01 - Latin American Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Modern Mexico - *Not offered this year/term
(History 288)
An analysis of the modern Mexican nation-state organized around three major themes: the conflictive yet symbiotic relationship with the United States, from the war of the 1840s through NAFTA most recently; the succession of reformist and revolutionary upheavals in 1810-1821, 1856-1867, 1910-1917, the 1930s, and again today, seeking to resolve both problems of the colonial past and new conflicts traceable to the very reforms generated by earlier political and social struggles; and the meaning of Mexican nationality from different ethnic, gender, and class perspectives. Readings include autobiographical and literary works, historical studies, and films.

(GNDST-333FC)
How do labor relationships and the social construction of what work means affect our lives as well as our communities? How do they contribute to shape our identities? In which ways can our gender, sexual orientation, race, social class or migratory status define our working possibilities? How do the concepts of marginality and informality emerge to identify the precarious Latin American labor conditions? Through Latin American films, students will problematize the idea of service, worker, industry, classic and non-classic work, sexual and affective work, and child labor, among others.

(Spring) Special Topics in Latin American Studies: Human Rights Abuses and Accountability Mechanisms in the Southern Cone of Latin America
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; POLIT-364)
During the 1960s and 1970s military coups brought authoritarian regimes to power in the Southern Cone (Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay). Human rights movements emerged demanding information about victims of torture, executions and disappearances which became the way military regimes attempted to eliminate dissent. What accounts for the different role these movements in the transition and consolidation of democracy and the rule of law? Did they take part to the same extent in the design and implementation of accountability mechanisms to prosecute those responsible for the abuses? We will answer these questions through the analysis of academic readings, movies, and primary sources.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 389)
Explores societies generated in the Americas by several widely distributed export crops. Multinational and cross-cultural comparisons holding constant the crop itself allows a focus on the possible variations by time and place in each commodity's technologies, labor systems, farm sizes, and social structure; their political and social dynamics; the problematic features of capitalism in agriculture, or if, how, and when do peasants become farmers and farming agribusiness? Particular focus on family and household relations under so-called "peasant to farmer" agricultural transitions and environmental implications of single-crop and export agriculture.

(Spring) Introduction to Latina/o Studies: Structural Inequalities
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
The course provides an overview of current and past social conditions of Latinas and Latinos within the U.S. We will address laws, policies and institutions that shape the complexity of Latinas/os' social location and serve as critical sites of resistance. The course addresses legal constructions of race and citizenship, nomenclature, border politics, public health, education, and labor. We will consider the critical intersections of class, gender and sexuality as well as inequality in relation to other persons of color. Students will develop a firm sense of the importance and breadth of the Latina/o political agenda and acquire skills to think across social issues.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 204LT, English 218LT)
We will explore a number of readings across different genres (the novel, play, poem, short story, graphic novel). Students will endeavor to understand how each author defines Latinidad. What characterizes Latina/os for each of these writers and how do their works articulate the historical conditions out of which they emerged? How is Latina/o literature marked by notions of language, nationality, gender, sexuality, class, race, politics, form, and genre? The readings will provide both a survey of general ideas in the study of Latina/o literatures as well as specific case studies and historical examples. The reading list is not meant to be comprehensive but to provide a sampling of texts.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Educational Studies 250SP)
This course demystifies college by focusing on three areas: 1) benefits of undergraduate research, 2) how to capitalize on the college experience, and 3) how to prepare for post-baccalaureate opportunities. Specifically, this course will teach students the elements of a research proposal by guiding them with original research. Moreover, students will learn strategies to thrive as undergraduates by exploring interests as means to finding their passion. In addition, this course will decipher the graduate/professional school application process. The overall goal of this course is to encourage and empower students to take their education and pre-professional experience into their own hands and equip them with the necessary tools to be successful.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 204CU, Latin American Studies 287CU)
This course introduces students to critical and creative works that center Cuba and its diasporas. The primary questions of the course are: How have authors variously imagined Cuba over time and across space? How are these imaginings of Cuba politically, economically, and culturally situated? Students will question the personal/national and the public/private across a range of texts that explore issues of exile, nostalgia, memory, and nationalism. Readings include works by Cristina Garcia, Ana Menéndez, Pablo Medina, Achy Obejas, Roberto G. Fernández, Carmelita Tropicana, Richard Blanco, and Rachel Kushner and readings by Gustavo Pérez Firmat, Sheila Croucher, and Louis A. Pérez, Jr.

(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Race, Racism, and Power
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Critical Social Thought 249RP)
This course analyzes the concepts of race and racism from an interdisciplinary perspective. Students will be asked to bring a critical lens to the ubiquitous, yet frequently misunderstood concepts of race and racism. We will study the sociocultural, political, economic, and historical forces that collaborate and compete with one another in the production of racial categories. This approach will require us to draw connections between wide-scale processes and everyday interactions. This will involve a consideration of a range of issues and concepts, including colonialism, nation, multiculturalism, representation, and violence. The analysis that we develop will ultimately allow us to think rigorously about social inequality, difference resistance, and liberation.

LATST-332-01 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Modern Families: Race/Ethnicity, Kinship and U.S. Popular Culture - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333FA, Critical Social Thought 332)
This course examines the social construction of the family unit in the United States across a range of historical periods and cultural texts. Students will dismantle universalist notions of what constitutes a family (particularly the nuclear family), understanding it instead as a social unit articulated by issues of race/ethnicity, gender, and sexuality and (re)produced with spatial and temporal specificities. Engaging first with historical texts to understand kinship as a legal, political and economic project, we will then turn to cultural production to investigate the role that literature, film, television, and art play in reifying, challenging, and/or reproducing the family.
Instructors: J. Hernández
Expected enrollment: 15

LATST-335-01 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Race and Representation in Latina/o Film - *Not offered this year/term
(Film Studies 370RR)
This seminar offers an interrogation of the ways in which Latinas and Latinos are represented in the cinema. We will explore early portrayals of Latinas and Latinos in film history and then explore contemporary cinema with a focus on race, class, gender and sexuality in these representations. Employing multiple aesthetic and disciplinary approaches we will analyze commercial films alongside independent films with particular attention to the market-driven and political mandates of these projects. We will focus on films by both Latina/o filmmakers and non-Latina/o filmmakers interrogating the multifarious points of entry of these artists.
Instructors: M. Díaz-Sánchez
Expected enrollment: 15
LATST-345-01 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Visualizing Immigrant Narratives: Migration in Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
This course offers an interrogation of overt and embedded narratives of migrants and the migration process in popular and documentary film, paying specific attention to cinematic representations of non-citizen bodies confronting migration, deportation, labor, acculturation, and anti-immigrant hysteria. Film screenings and class discussions comprise the interpretative lens through which students will examine the aesthetic, cultural, economic, gendered, historical, political, racial and sexual dimensions of cultural texts. The course is supplemented with readings about immigration policies and histories.
Prerequisites: jr, sr
Notes: Plus 2-3 special screenings
Instructors: D. Hernandez
Expected enrollment: 18

LATST-350-01 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Latinas/os and Housing: Mi Casa Is Not Su Casa
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 349MC)
Housing is closely tied to quality of life and the health of neighborhoods and communities. This interdisciplinary seminar explores Latinas/os' relationship to housing and home ownership by examining: the history of housing policy in the United States; national identity, assimilation and housing; and discriminatory housing policies/programs and housing inequality. We will explore topics including immigration, housing policy, public housing, segregation, gentrification, the suburbs, and community building. Exploring this range of topics will help us develop a more clear understanding of why housing is one of the most pressing issues for Latinas/os today.

LATST-350-01 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Displacement and Dispersion: Theorizing Diasporic Literatures - *Not offered this year/term
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 349DS)
What is a diaspora? How do displaced populations make sense of the self, the community, and the homeland when they are no longer in a place they call home? How does the fractured subject suture their identity? This seminar combines: theories on the definitions of diaspora; scholarly research on particular diasporic communities; and literary depictions of the diasporic subject's experience. Students gain the intellectual frameworks that prevail amidst Diaspora Studies while simultaneously grounding these scholarly concepts in the field of literature. Readings include works by: Tokólyan, Safran, Hall, Clifford, Hayes Edwards, Su, Eng, Gopinath, Hartman, Diaz, Lahiri, García, and others.
Prerequisites: Preference for juniors and seniors if course is overenrolled

LATST-350-03 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Latina Feminism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Gender Studies 333FM; Critical Social Thought 349FM)
What is Latina Feminism? How does it differ from and/or intersect with other feminisms? This interdisciplinary course explores Latina feminism in relation to methodology and epistemology through a historical lens. We will explore topics related to knowledge production, philosophies of the "self," positionality, the body, and representation. Our approach in this class will employ an interlocking analysis to feminist theory that understands the interconnectedness between multiple forms of oppression, including race, class, sexuality, and ability. Our goal is to develop a robust understanding of how Latina feminist methodologies and epistemologies can be tools for social change.
Instructors: V. Rosa
LATST-350-04 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Latina/o Studies: Critical Race Theory in Education
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Educational Studies 351RT; Critical Social Thought 349RT)
This course focuses on Critical Race Theory, its history and application in the field of Education. Through course readings and assignments, students will explore and discuss key issues such as race/racism, class/classism, gender/sexism among other "isms" and how they impact the teaching and learning experiences of students of color. This course is specifically designed to challenge students and make them think critically about their multiple identities, privileges and challenges as students and future leaders. The goal is gain a critical understanding of the connection between theory, research, and practice in order to better understand educational structures, processes, and discourses.
Notes: Students interested in careers within Education are highly encouraged to enroll.
Instructors: A. Soltero-López

LATST-360-01 - Latina/o Studies - 2016-2017
(Fall) Latina/o Immigration
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Gender Studies 333UU; Sociology 316MM)
The course provides an historical and topical overview of Latina/o migration to the United States. We will examine the economic, political, and social antecedents to Latin American migration, and the historical impact of the migration process in the U.S. Considering migration from Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean, we will discuss the social construction of race, the gendered nature of migration, migrant labor struggles, Latin American-U.S. Latino relations, immigration policy, and border life and enforcement. Notions of citizenship, race, class, gender, and sexuality will be central to our understanding of the complexity at work in the migration process.
Notes: Community-based learning is optional in this class.

Mathematics

MATH-100-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Precalculus: Problem Solving and Quantitative Reasoning
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is intended for students who, based on the results of their mathematics assessment and the agreement of the instructor, need to strengthen their quantitative and algebraic skills in order to be ready to progress to further mathematics, science, and economics courses. In this class students learn to translate real problems into mathematics, to solve complex multi-step problems, and to gain confidence in using logarithms, exponents, and trigonometry in different contexts.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Send score from math online self-assessment and background information to dshepard@mtholyoke.edu
Instructors: D. Shepardson
Expected enrollment: 25

MATH-101-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Calculus I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is for students who have not studied calculus and who have the necessary precalculus background. It presents rates of change and their applications, integrals, the fundamental theorem, and modeling of phenomena in the natural and social sciences. All students are required to complete the online self assessment of precalculus skills before the course begins.
Instructors: P. Rosnick

MATH-114-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Explorations in Number Theory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
We will cover the arithmetic of whole numbers and of prime numbers, in particular, examining some of the earliest questions in mathematics from a modern perspective, finding whole number solutions to equations with several variables, deciding whether or not such solutions exist and if so, determining whether the solution set is finite or infinite. Topics include the theory of "finite arithmetic," converting questions about the infinite set of whole numbers to those involving just a small set of primes, using computers to examine problems numerically.
Prerequisites: a good grasp of arithmetic
Instructors: the department

MATH-301-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Real Analysis
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Topics include the real number system, convergence of sequences and series, power series, uniform convergence, compactness and connectedness, continuity, abstract treatment of differential and integral calculus, metric spaces, and point-set topology.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 102, 211, and 232
Instructors: D. Shepardson
Expected enrollment: 20

MATH-302-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Complex Analysis
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Topics include differentiation and integration of functions of a complex variable, the Cauchy integral formula, residues, conformal mapping, and applications to physical science and number theory.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 203 and 301 or Intro to Math Methods (Physics 303/200/205)
Notes: offered alternate years at Mount Holyoke and Smith Colleges
Instructors: G. Davidoff
Expected enrollment: 19

MATH-327-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Advanced Logic - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Philosophy 327)
This course uses the predicate calculus to present a careful development of formal elementary number theory, and elementary recursion theory, culminating in a proof of Gödel's incompleteness results. It includes some discussion of the philosophical significance of these results for the foundations of mathematics.
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 19

MATH-329-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Geometry and Topology: Topology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is an introduction to point-set topology, which is a fundamental language for much of modern mathematics. One of the goals of topology is to understand what it means for a function to be continuous, first in Euclidean space, and then to generalize the notion of continuity to other spaces. The core topics to be studied include: basic set theory, various interesting topologies, continuous functions, connectedness and compactness. Topics from algebraic topology will be covered if time permits.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 232 and any 300 level math class
Instructors: J. Sidman
Expected enrollment: 16

MATH-333-01 - Mathematics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Differential Equations
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This is an introduction to differential equations for students in the mathematical or other sciences. Topics include first-order equations, second-order linear equations, qualitative study of dynamical systems, and first- and second-order linear partial differential equations.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 211
Instructors: A. Hoyer-Leitzel
A stochastic process is a collection of random variables. For example, the daily prices of a particular stock are a stochastic process. Topics of this course will include Markov chains, queueing theory, the Poisson process, and Brownian motion. In addition to theory, the course will investigate applications of stochastic processes, including models of call centers and models of stock prices. Simulations of stochastic processes will also be used to compare with the theory.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 211 and 342

Instructors: T. Chumley

Expected enrollment: 25

This course develops the ideas of probability simultaneously from experimental and theoretical perspectives. The laboratory provides a range of experiences that enhance and sharpen the theoretical approach and, moreover, allows us to observe regularities in complex phenomena and to conjecture theorems. Topics include: introductory experiments; axiomatic probability; random variables, expectation, and variance; discrete distributions; continuous distributions; stochastic processes; functions of random variables; estimation and hypothesis testing.

Music

MUSIC-100-01 - Music - 2016-2017
(Fall) Rudiments of Music
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this half-semester course students will become familiar with the elements of music notation (staves, clefs, pitch names, note and rest values) and with some of the basic skills necessary for college-level music instruction (e.g., construction and identification of scales, intervals, triads, and basic diatonic functions).
Notes: Meets for only the first half of each semester.

MUSIC-102-01 - Music - 2016-2017
(Spring) Music and Technology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
It is now possible to record, manipulate, notate, and compose music with a variety of powerful and flexible tools using the personal computer. This course will focus on hands-on experience with various sorts of music software, including recording and editing, mixing, synthesis and midi interfaces, notation, and various instructional programs. In the process of experimenting with these tools and operating on their favorite musical styles, students will learn a good bit of notation, ear training, and rudimentary principles of arrangement and composition. Basic computer literacy (such as comfort with basic editing commands and the concept of keyboard shortcuts) is required.
Instructors: R. Eisenstein
Expected enrollment: 16

MUSIC-103-01 - Music - 2016-2017
(Fall) History of Jazz
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will follow the origins and evolution of jazz from the late nineteenth century to the present, with emphases on prominent stylistic trends and significant individuals. Along with some analysis of the musical language jazz employs, the music will be examined in its relation to the social contexts that helped produce and shape it. The ability to read music is not a requirement for this course.
Instructors: D. Sanford

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar

The seminar will introduce and discuss various musical works and genres that fall under rock critic Ann Powers' definitions of "Violator Art," exploring them within the context of their wanton and disturbing appeal, as well as their often scandalous social impact. Topics will include the Second Viennese School, free jazz, protest music, punk rock, hip-hop, works such as J. S. Bach's "Cantata No. 179," Strauss's "Salome," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du printemps," Billie Holiday's "Strange Fruit," George Crumb's "Black Angels," and artists such as Frank Zappa, Donna Summer, Prince, and Nirvana.

Prerequisites: fy

Notes: Students should be prepared for mature themes and some coarse language.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Adventures in Music

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

Designed for students with or without prior musical experience, "Adventures in Music" explores the materials of music. Through reading, hands-on interaction with instruments and their players, discussions and recordings, students will explore concepts of pitch, time, space, structure and timbre, thereby enriching their perception of the world of sound. The best way to access the indescribable in music is often to make music. With this in mind the class will embark in mini composition projects culminating in a final project that utilizes the knowledge acquired over the duration of the course.

(Fall) World Music

(Writing-intensive)

This course is a survey of selected musical traditions from different parts of the world, including Africa, Indonesia, Indian, the Caribbean, and the United States. The course adopts an ethnomusicological approach that explains music as a cultural phenomenon, and explores the social and aesthetic significance of musical traditions within their respective historical and cultural contexts. It examines how musical traditions change over time, and how such changes reflect and relate to social and political changes within a given society. Weekly reading and listening assignments provide the basis for class discussions. Students are expected to undertake a final project in music ethnography.

(Spring) African Folk Opera in Theory and Practice - *Not offered this year/term

(Writing-intensive; Theatre 215AF)

In this course, African folk opera will provide the framework for exploring salient features of African music. The course will begin by examining a wide range of performance elements, including ensemble practice, the role of dance, and musical storytelling. The second part will feature practical sessions culminating in a public performance of an African folk opera. Students will work with visiting African master drummers and choreographer. The practical sessions will afford students an opportunity to reflect on the theoretical issues examined earlier on in the semester, and gain practical knowledge of the African operatic tradition.

(Spring) Music 321-01 - Advanced Interdisciplinary Topics: Art, Music and the Brain
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Art and music are a part of all human cultures. Is there something about the human brain that drives us to paint and sing? We will examine how the brain simultaneously processes different aspects of visual and auditory stimuli, ask how this processing may affect the way we do art and music, and explore where these phenomena may occur in the brain. As we engage in discussion and hands-on activities, we will discover the commonalities between the arts and the sciences including practice, experimentation, exploration, innovation, and creativity.

MUSIC-371-01 - Music - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Music: Music and Childhood in the Western Tradition - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This course examines significant moments in the history of children as creators, performers, consumers, and subjects of music in the Western tradition. From Mozart to Michael Jackson, medieval psalmody to Debussy's Children's Corner and beyond, we will survey the enlisting of children, childhood, and the childlike across a range of musical genres and pedagogical, aesthetic, and cultural-political agendas. For their final project, students may work with a historical artifact of children's musical culture, or research a local children's music program or ensemble.
Prerequisites: Music 282 and 232
Instructors: A. Mueller
Expected enrollment: 7

MUSIC-371-02 - Music - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Music: Shakespeare and Music to 1800
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Writing-intensive)
This seminar develops skills in the use of primary materials for musicological, ethnomusicological, and/or theoretical research; in critical engagement with published scholarship; and in the communication of original research to a wider community. Collaborative inquiry on a specific interdisciplinary topic provides the context from which each student fashions a substantial independent project, often with a practical or public component. This year, the topic is musical settings and adaptations of Shakespeare from 1590-1800. Students will collectively research, program, rehearse, and perform an evening-length program of music from Shakespeare’s Tempest.
Prerequisites: Music 282 and Music 232
Notes: Students who wish only to participate as dancers, actors, singers, or musicians may register for a single unit of ensemble credit: See Music 147A Collegium.
Instructors: A. Mueller
Expected enrollment: 7

MUSIC-374-01 - Music - 2016-2017
(Spring) Advanced Seminar in Ethnomusicology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking-and writing-intensive; Anthropology 316ET)
Designed for music and non-music majors, this advanced seminar examines core theoretical and methodological issues in ethnomusicology and the debates that have shaped its practice since its origins in the early twentieth century as comparative musicology. Drawing on musical traditions from different parts of the world and supplemented by workshops conducted by visiting professional musicians, the course explores the interdisciplinary approaches that inform how ethnomusicologists study the significance of music "in" and "as" culture. Topics covered will include ethnomusicological methods, the intersection of musicological and anthropological perspectives, the political significance of musical hybridity, applied ethnomusicology, and sound studies.

NEURO-100-01 - Neuroscience and Behavior - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Neuroscience and Behavior
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This comprehensive survey course explores the brain and the biological basis of behavior. We will examine the anatomy of the nervous system and the unique properties of the cells that make up the brain. We will discuss the mechanisms by which individual brain cells communicate with each other, and how small networks of cells underlie more complex processes such as perception, learning, and behavior. In labs, students will perform experiments that expand upon and reinforce these ideas through hands-on exercises.

Our minds can direct and control our bodies. See for yourself: if you decide to lift your arm, and try to do it, your arm will probably go up! This course is about the relationship between our minds, bodies, and behavior. What is the mind? How did it make your arm go up? How is lifting your arm different from an involuntary muscle spasm? The answers are not as straightforward as you might think. We confront powerful arguments that the mind is not reducible to the brain or any part of the body. We explore how philosophers and neuroscientists think about the difference between intentional behaviors, like lifting your arm, and unintentional movements, like tics, twitches, and yawns.

Philosophy

PHIL-101-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will explore topics that philosophers have grappled with for thousands of years, and that still undergird (or sometimes threaten to undermine) our understanding of the world, our knowledge, ourselves, and each other. In historical and modern texts of the Western intellectual tradition, we will discuss questions such as: Are we all selfish? What makes right actions right, if anything? Do you know anything at all about the future? Are you really free if your actions are caused? This class is for first and second year students who know nothing about philosophy, and want to know whether they will be interested in it. Students with some exposure to, and interest in, the field should take other classes.
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 75

PHIL-102-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: Socrates Meets Confucius - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
The "Hundred Schools" period (770-221 BCE) in ancient China was one of the most important and exciting philosophical eras in world history. Thinkers from this period include: Kongzi (Confucius), "Laozi" (the legendary author of the Daodejing), Mengzi, Mozi, Xunzi, Han Feizi, and Zhuangzi. At roughly the same time (~585-270 BCE), we see an equally startling number of great thinkers working in ancient Greece, including Heraclitus, Parmenides, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Epicurus, Zeno of Citium, and Pyrrho. The aim of this course is to learn about doing philosophy by reading some of the works of various thinkers from these two traditions side by side.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 16

PHIL-102-02 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: Being Human - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar
What is it to be human? Does this depend only on human biology? Or does it also imply being distinctively free or autonomous, involving our ability to speak a language, reason, or interact and form communities with other human beings? Is being human equivalent to being a person? Are human beings inherently selfish? If human beings are essentially social animals, how are we so? Are seemingly inescapable features of being human like gender or race based on human biology? Finally, is perhaps being human distinctive because only human beings can raise the question of what it is to be human? What is at stake in raising and answering this question? We will critically examine the answers to this question that readings from both the Western and non-Western intellectual traditions provide.

PHIL-102-03 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: Philosophical Questions in and about Literature
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
This course examines philosophical themes in literature and philosophical questions about works of literature. Can we learn about the world from reading works of fiction? What is the meaning of a work of literature, and how can we know it? Are the author's intentions relevant to how we should understand a work? Can works of literature be immoral? How is the identity of the reader relevant to the understanding of a literary work? We will read works such as Iris Murdoch's The Black Prince, Henry James' The Turn of the Screw, Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, and Kafka's Metamorphosis.

PHIL-103-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Comparative Introduction to Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
What kind of life should a person live? What can we know about the world? Do we have souls that are separate from our bodies? The aim of the course is to learn how to do philosophy by engaging with philosophical thinkers throughout the globe. We read some philosophers from the Western tradition (such as Plato and Sartre) alongside philosophers from other historical traditions, such as the Daoist thinker Zhuangzi and the Sufi mystic al-Ghazali, and we also read some contemporary thinkers from a variety of cultural traditions (such as Martin Luther King, Jr. and Jorge Gracia). This course is equivalent to Philosophy 101.

PHIL-201-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Philosophical Foundations of Western Thought: Ancient History of Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to ancient Greek philosophy, focusing mainly but not exclusively on the works and ideas of three Athenian philosophers who worked and taught in the period between the Persian Wars and the rule of Alexander the Great, more than 2,300 years ago: Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. Topics to be discussed include: What is the nature of the self? What is truth, and how can it be known? What kind of life should we live? We will work to understand each philosopher's responses to these questions, but we will also learn to develop our own answers. We will take care to place these figures and their works in their historical and cultural context.

PHIL-205-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Ethics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will focus on classic and contemporary work on central topics in ethics. The goal will be to see whether there is anything to be said in a principled way about what to do and how to live. The core of the course will be an examination of the central traditions in moral philosophy in the West, typified by Aristotle, Kant, and Mill. We will also examine vexing contemporary moral issues with an eye to whether moral theories can give us practical guidance. Finally, we will step back and ask whether any of the moral theorizing we have been engaging in is really capable of uncovering objective moral truths.
Instructors: A. Ali
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-209-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Theories of Probability and Causation - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
In this course we will look at theories of causation, probability, and their interaction. We will look first at Hume on causation, and then move on to some very basic probability theory. We will briefly explore the standard statistical approaches and go on to Bayesian reasoning and confirmation theory. Finally, we'll examine recent developments in the Bayesian Net theory of causation. As a whole, the class is an investigation of recent mathematical and philosophical theories about how science works, what justifies the hypotheses we ought to believe, and how observations could justify hypotheses about unobserved entities and regions.
Prerequisites: One course in either Philosophy or Mathematics or per I.
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 49

PHIL-210-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Logical Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course cultivates sound reasoning. Students will learn to see the structure of claims and arguments and to use those structures in developing strong arguments and exposing shoddy ones. We will learn to evaluate arguments on the strength of the reasoning rather than on the force of their associations and buzzwords.
Instructors: A. Ali
Expected enrollment: 49

PHIL-225-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Symbolic Logic
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course develops a symbolic system that can be used as the basis for inference in all fields. It will provide syntax and semantics for the language of this system and investigate its adequacy. It provides the basis for all further work in logic or in the philosophical foundations of mathematics. Much of the course has a mathematical flavor, but no knowledge of mathematics is necessary.
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 75

PHIL-238-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Ethics of Career Choice - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Mary Lyon said "When you choose your fields of labor, go where no one else will go." For most students attending a college like Mount Holyoke, one of the most important questions is: what career should I prepare to pursue after graduation? When most of us think about this question, we tend to think about self-centered considerations: what will make us happy, or express our talents, or provide financial independence. This class examines the ethical aspects of choosing a career. Do we have moral responsibilities to others, to ourselves, or to future generations, in choosing our careers? For example, are we obligated to work against social injustice? How should such moral considerations affect this most important of choices?
Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 20

PHIL-242-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Social and Political Philosophy - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course focuses upon three central areas of political philosophy: Foundational Concepts; The Government, the Economy, and Morality; and Applied Political Philosophy. Within these areas we will consider issues such as: obedience to authority, rights, justice, freedom, equality, as well as more applied and pressing issues such as immigration rights.
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-248-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Philosophical Issues in Race and Racism - *Not offered this year/term
This course examines the nature of race and racism primarily (but not exclusively) from a philosophical perspective. What kind of entity or category is "race"? Is it something real at all? If so, how is it real exactly? If not, what consequences (should) follow from its lack of reality? Do we have to be a member of a "race" in order to (have the right to) know and speak for it? How is race and race-thinking relevant for our personal and group identities? What is the nature of racism? How do race, ethnicity, gender, and class intersect? How legitimate are race-based social policies that aim to bring about social justice or diversity? Readings will come from philosophy and a variety of interdisciplinary texts (e.g., film and other media).

Instructors: J. Koo

Expected enrollment: 49

PHIL-249-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Women and Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 210PH)
The goal of this course is to see how careful philosophical thought can help us with pressing issues that women face. We approach this topic through a distinctly feminist lens, as opposed to a traditional philosophical, queer theoretic, or gender studies lens. We will draw on a variety of philosophical resources, ranging from liberal and feminist political theory, to speech act theory. Possible questions we will consider include: What is objectification? What is consent? Is pornography degrading? How does sexism and bias lead to bad science?

Instructors: H. Webster

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-250-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Philosophy: History of Analytic Philosophy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This class is about how philosophy tried to be a science, and rejected most of its history as metaphysical nonsense. It's about how and why this failed, and returned to metaphysics. There were three phases: Logical Positivism, which argued that most of the history of philosophy was meaningless babble, and should be replaced by a much more scientific approach to the issues. Quine, who replaced the positivists with a pragmatic view of the subject. And Kripke/Lewis who returned Metaphysics to the center of concern using possible worlds. This last approach brings us to the present day. We'll read the most influential figures: Frege, Russell, Schlick, Carnap, Quine, Lewis Kripke. These developments provide the background for nearly all Contemporary Philosophy.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in department, including logic
Instructors: S. Mitchell

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-255-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Existentialism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Critical Social Thought 258)
Does human life have meaning (purpose)? Can religion or spirituality provide it? If not, is human life "abundant"? How can we attain or create meaning in the face of the "abundance" of human life? What is genuine human freedom? Are other people in the world obstacles to, or also sources for, our attempt to attain or create meaning in our lives? What is existential commitment and "authenticity"? Is existential ethics possible at all? We will examine the central themes of existentialism in readings from Kierkegaard, Dostoyevsky, Nietzsche, Sartre, Camus, de Beauvoir, and Fanon (among others). We will also end the course by considering some significant criticisms of existentialism.
Instructors: J. Koo

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-260-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Applied Philosophy: Environmental Ethics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Environmental Studies 233ET)
Preamble (for topics courses): These courses ask questions about the ethical and/or conceptual problems pertaining to a practice, such as law, medicine, or caring for the natural environment. Such courses are suitable for philosophy majors as well as for students who are new to philosophy but who are interested in the relevant practice.
A fundamental problem we face as humans is how we should relate to the natural world. Why not turn Yosemite into a parking lot? Should we control nature by applying scientific and technological expertise? Or should we strive for noninterference and preservation of the wild? How do we balance the pressing needs of people for food, energy, and other resources with the needs of other species or whole ecosystems?
Instructors: A. Ali

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-260-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Applied Philosophy: Medical Ethics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): These courses ask questions about the ethical and/or conceptual problems pertaining to a practice, such as law, medicine, or caring for the natural environment. Such courses are suitable for philosophy majors as well as for students who are new to philosophy but who are interested in the relevant practice.

Over the last century, advancements in medical practice have introduced new ethical questions and made old problems more pressing. Given the possibility of painless death, is it wrong for physicians to assist terminally-ill patients who wish to end their life? Should parents exercise control over the genetic makeup of their children? How should we distribute scarce medical resources? This course gives students the tools needed to think critically about these questions and arrive at better and more thoughtful answers to them.

Instructors: A. Ali

Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-260-02 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Applied Philosophy: Problems in Global Ethics: Climate Change, War, and Poverty
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses ask questions about the ethical and/or conceptual problems pertaining to a practice, such as law, medicine, or caring for the natural environment. Such courses are suitable for philosophy majors as well as for students who are new to philosophy but who are interested in the relevant practice.

Living in today's world presents distinctive and pressing moral problems. What are the responsibilities of individuals, particularly individuals living in relatively affluent societies, to prevent climate change, or to alleviate the harms caused by it? How should we act to prevent war, and should we ever initiate wars in order to prevent greater evils (such as terrorism)? What responsibilities do citizens of relatively affluent nations have to prevent and ameliorate poverty and global inequality? In order to reason clearly about these questions, we will need to think deeply about the notion of global citizenship (or "cosmopolitanism") and the nature of individual moral responsibility.

Instructors: J. Harold

Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-260-03 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Applied Philosophy: Ethics in Entrepreneurship and Business
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses ask questions about the ethical and/or conceptual problems pertaining to a practice, such as law, medicine, or caring for the natural environment. Such courses are suitable for philosophy majors as well as for students who are new to philosophy but who are interested in the relevant practice.

What are the special challenges of obligation and responsibility that individuals, businesses and other organizations face in a complex global environment? We explore these questions using applied philosophical ethics from the traditional approaches to moral philosophy (studying the ethical character of both actions themselves and the results of those actions) and the more recent ethics of care. We apply these ethical considerations in different cases and contexts of individual decision-making and the choices and dilemmas that businesses and other organizations face.

PHIL-264-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Philosophy of Mind - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course explores long-standing questions about the nature of consciousness; the relationship between mind and body; the relationship between mind and language; and the role that science has (if any) in negotiating these questions. The course will emphasize the philosophical understanding and implications of current work in neuroscience.

Prerequisites: 4 credits in Philosophy

Instructors: The department

PHIL-270-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Epistemology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

As the study of knowledge and related concepts like justification, rationality, and evidence, epistemology is of central importance, and not just to philosophy. This course provides an introduction to epistemology through a number of epistemological problems or puzzles about skepticism, dogmatism, and humility.

Prerequisites: 4 credits in Philosophy

Instructors: K. Vavova

Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-273-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Philosophy of the Arts - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
The purpose of this course is to explore philosophical problems concerning the arts and aesthetic experience. Some questions to be explored include: What is the difference between beauty and moral goodness? Can artistic taste be objective? What does it mean for a work of music to be "sad"? Are the intentions of artists relevant to appreciation? What is the purpose of art criticism? How do pictures represent their objects? Readings will be drawn from both historical and contemporary philosophical writings.

Instructors: J. Harold
Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-275-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Philosophy and Film Theory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Film Studies 290PT)
An exploration of philosophical and theoretical issues encountered in the study of film such as: Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? There will be weekly required film screenings.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in Philosophy or Film Studies
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 27

PHIL-295-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Independent Study

Instructors: The department.

PHIL-321-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar in Philosophy of Language - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
How do words come to mean things? Frege introduced two aspects of meaning: reference, that is, whatever expressions pick out in the world, and sense, a publicly accessible means by which expressions pick out their references, which must be grasped by all speakers. This course is an extended examination of the concept of sense, the uses to which it has been put, and the criticisms that have been lodged against it. We'll look at Frege's work, the complaints made by Quine and Kripke, Davidson's theory of meaning, and Dummett's defense of sense.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in department
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-327-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Advanced Logic - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course uses the predicate calculus to present a careful development of formal elementary number theory, and elementary recursion theory, culminating in a proof of Gödel's incompleteness results. It includes some discussion of the philosophical significance of these results for the foundations of mathematics.
Prerequisites: Philosophy 225
Instructors: S. Mitchell
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-328-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Non-Classical Logic
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course looks at the recent flowering of non-classical logics. The most prominent are modal logics concerning necessity and possibility, which have come to dominate work in metaphysics and epistemology. Conditional logics, intuitionist logics, and relevance logics have also become important. These logics are particularly useful in graduate-level classes in philosophy but also are interesting in their own right.
Prerequisites: One course in Logic, Mathematics, Computer Science or Philosophy 209
PHIL-334-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Ethics: Meta-Ethics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Meta-ethics is the study of the concepts and methods used in ethical discourse and debate. It is not the study, for example, of which actions are right or wrong, but rather of what the terms "right" and "wrong" mean. Possible questions to be discussed in this seminar include: Can moral judgments be true or false? Are moral judgments expressions of feelings? Are they objective or subjective? Are we rationally required to be moral? Are there moral facts? How are moral and aesthetic judgments different?
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Philosophy
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-334-02 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Ethics: Moral Epistemology - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will focus on a handful of epistemic challenges to morality. We will consider questions such as: How is moral knowledge possible? Can we gain moral knowledge from testimony? What are the implications of the prevalence of moral disagreement? Do our evolutionary origins pose a challenge to our moral beliefs?
Prerequisites: 8 credits in department including Philosophy 205
Instructors: E. Vavova
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-350-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Philosophy: Freedom and Responsibility
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Is free will possible if all our actions are causally determined? Might we be justified in blaming, praising, rewarding, or punishing people even if their actions are not free? Abstract metaphysical questions about freedom intersect in important ways with everyday problems in our relationships with others and our attitudes about moral ignorance, addiction, and madness. This course will examine these issues side by side in the hope of improving our understanding of freedom and responsibility.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in the department
Instructors: K. Vavova
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-350-02 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Philosophy: Mind and Action
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Neuro 309MA)
Our minds can direct and control our bodies. See for yourself: if you decide to lift your arm, and try to do it, your arm will probably go up! This course is about the relationship between our minds, bodies, and behavior. What is the mind? How did it make your arm go up? How is lifting your arm different from an involuntary muscle spasm? The answers are not as straightforward as you might think. We confront powerful arguments that the mind is not reducible to the brain or any part of the body. We explore how philosophers and neuroscientists think about the difference between intentional behaviors, like lifting your arm, and unintentional movements, like tics, twitches, and yawns.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Philosophy, or 4 credits in Philosophy and 4 credits in Neuroscience and Behavior
Instructors: A. Ali
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-351-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Spring) Systematic Study of One Philosopher: Kant - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Immanuel Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is one of the few works in the Western philosophic tradition that fundamentally transformed our understanding of the place of human beings in the world. This seminar involves a careful, critical reading of the text in order to assess the nature and significance of the epistemological and metaphysical views it expounds. There will be frequent, short papers.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in department including Philosophy 202 or equivalent
Instructors: The department
Expected enrollment: 19

PHIL-353-01 - Philosophy - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Social Philosophy: The Philosophy of Recognition
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Since the 1960s, many social movements for justice, equality, and inclusion in our world have taken the form of struggles for recognition (e.g., antiracism, feminism, multiculturalism, LGBT activism, etc.). What is recognition in this sense and conversely misrecognition, i.e., the sort of harm or injustice done to someone or certain populations of people by failing or choosing not to recognize them? How can (mis)recognition show up and be theorized both as a matter of how people are socially constituted and how they should treat one another? We will discuss readings (among others) from Rousseau, Hegel, Marx, Hannah Arendt, Iris Young, Charles Taylor, Axel Honneth, Nancy Fraser, and Patchen Markell.

Prerequisites: One prior course at the 200 level in philosophy, politics, sociology, critical social thought, or gender studies. Not open to first-year students.

Physical Education and Athletics (Academic Credit)

PHYED-110-01 - Physical Education and Athletics (Academic Credit) - 2016-2017

(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Pursuit of Wellness

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

This course examines topics within the physical, mental, psychological, and social dimensions of wellness. Current research and trends in health and wellness are emphasized and students will be encouraged to apply this knowledge in practical ways for healthful living. While this course is not activity-based, a few classes will involve physical activity to promote wellness.

Prerequisites: fy

(Spring) Introduction to Sport Pedagogy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Community-based learning course)

This course is designed to introduce students to the many facets of sport pedagogy and coaching. Our focus is the strategies and styles of coaching youth sports. Topics include coaching philosophy, motor learning, anatomy and physiology, biomechanics, sport psychology and risk management/liability. Other topics include the benefits of playing sports, developing age-appropriate instruction and training, goal setting, effective feedback, special issues in coaching children, and coaches as role models for children. In a local school system, we will apply the concepts and theories learned, by developing and implementing lesson plans to introduce various athletic skills and sports.

Notes: No PE units awarded.

Physics

PHYS-100-01  -  Physics  -  2016-2017
(Fall) Foundations of Physics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course studies a variety of topics in physics unified by the physical notions of force, energy, and equilibrium. Mathematics is used at the level of geometry, proportion, and dimensional analysis. Topics, drawn from the MCAT syllabus, include geometrical optics, time, oscillation, statics, elasticity, conservation of energy, and fluids.
Instructors: K. Nordstrom

Expected enrollment: 32

PHYS-104-01  -  Physics  -  2016-2017
(Spring) Renewable Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Environmental Studies 104)
We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.
Instructors: A. Arango

PHYS-105-01  -  Physics  -  2016-2017
(Fall) Science in the Media  -  *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)
Popular coverage of science ranges in depth and accuracy, and many scientists do not see the importance of communicating their work, or their excitement, to the general public. Scientific breakthroughs contribute to everyone's quality of life, but the process is poorly understood by many, leading to misunderstandings and misgivings that can affect public policy. This course will look at newsworthy results from current scientific research, exploring topics to better understand the science, ideas such as scientific consensus and repeatability, and examining the tension that may exist between the scientists and the public. Topics will be pulled largely from the physical sciences.
Prerequisites: fy
Instructors: K. Aidala
Expected enrollment: 16

PHYS-108-01  -  Physics  -  2016-2017
(Fall) Gender in Science
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
This course examines explanations for the underrepresentation of women in science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) with an eye to identifying how to increase the participation of women in science. The course will address questions about gender differences in cognition and ability, the role of stereotyping, as well as the "leaky pipeline" issue, that is, the rate and timing of the departure of women from scientific fields. Course readings will explore the psychology of gender, as it relates to STEM. In addition, we will read research from physical scientists, reports from professional organizations such as the American Physical Society, and reports from congressional committees.

Expected enrollment: 16
PHYS-110-01 - Physics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Force, Motion, and Energy
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
Studies the mechanics of material objects. Topics include Newton's laws, projectile motion, circular motion, momentum, kinetic and potential energy, angular momentum, gravitation, and oscillations. This course is appropriate for students intending to major in a physical science.
Prerequisites: Knowledge of calculus as demonstrated by Math 101 or equivalent
Instructors: K. Aidala

PHYS-210-01 - Physics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Waves and Optics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A comprehensive treatment of wave phenomena, particularly light, leading to an introductory study of quantum mechanics. Topics include wave propagation, polarization, interference and interferometry, diffraction, and special relativity.
Prerequisites: Electromagnetism (Physics 201) and Intro to Math Methods (Physics 205) or concurrent enrollment in 205
Instructors: A. Burger
Expected enrollment: 30

PHYS-220-01 - Physics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Intermediate Lab in Physics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This lab-based course is an introduction to modern, investigative, experimental physics. The course is intended as a bridge between the structured introductory lab experience and independent research. Students will engage in a semester-long experimental project, participating in experimental design, construction, debugging and implementation. Students will practice presenting and interpreting experimental results and will be encouraged to develop follow-up experimental questions of their own. This course will also introduce students to scientific communication skills, and is speaking- and writing-intensive.
Prerequisites: Physics 205 and 210, or Physics 205 and concurrent enrollment in Physics 210
Instructors: A. Arango
Expected enrollment: 12

PHYS-222-01 - Physics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Comparative Biomechanics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
(Biological Sciences 322)
The main objective of this course is to explore organismal structure and function via an examination of the basic physical principles that guide how living things are constructed and how organisms interact with their environment. We will use the combined approaches of the biologist and engineer to study the impact of size on biological systems, address the implications of solid and fluid mechanics for animal design, survey different modes of animal locomotion, and learn how biologists working in diverse areas (e.g., ecology, development, evolution, and physiology) gain insight through biomechanical analyses.
Prerequisites: Physics 110 and permission of the instructor
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 lab (3 hours) with 12 per lab

PHYS-250-01 - Physics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Quantum Mechanical Phenomena
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an introduction to quantum mechanics. The Uncertainty Principle, Schroedinger's Equation, and the hydrogen atom are studied in depth, with emphasis on angular momentum, electron spin, and the Pauli Exclusion Principle.

Prerequisites: Physics 205 and 210

Instructors: A. Burger

(Fall) Advanced Laboratory Practicum - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course is a hands-on practicum, intended to introduce students to the practice of modern physics research. Depending on student interest, topics include external research seminars by practitioners in the field, training in oral and written scientific communication, presentation and interpretation of research results, scientific modeling, and hands-on experimental skills. Research projects are an integral part of this course; credit will be apportioned in relation to the intensity of the project.

(Fall) From Lilliput to Brobdingnag: Bridging the Scales Between Science and Engineering
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Writing-intensive; Chemistry 328)
The performance of many engineered devices is dependent on macroscopic factors (pressure, temperature, flow, conductivity). As a result, engineers often model devices macroscopically considering atomistic level details only through fixed parameters. These parameters do not always capture the full atomistic level picture. More accurate multi-scale approaches for modeling macroscopic properties use basic atomistic level chemistry at key points in larger scale simulations. This course is an introduction to such approaches focusing on fuel cells as a concrete example. Basic scientific principles will be developed along side of basic engineering principles through project/case studies.
Prerequisites: Mathematics 102/202 and Physics 201
Instructors: M. Gomez
Expected enrollment: 16

PHYS-336-01 - Physics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Quantum Mechanics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course is an introduction to formal quantum theory: the wave function and its interpretation, observables and linear operators, matrix mechanics and the uncertainty principle; solutions of one-dimensional problems; solutions of three-dimensional problems and angular momentum; and perturbative methods.
Prerequisites: Physics 250
Notes: Physics 324 or 336 will normally be offered in alternating years
Instructors: N. Abraham

(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Speaking and Arguing: The Rhetoric of Peace and War - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)

The art and mechanics of persuading a polity to support either war or peace through oral argument. How speeches frame issues, mobilize public opinion, and persuade individuals to support or resist decisions to go to war. Students will be expected to deliver speeches, lead discussions, and critique their own and others' presentations.

(Spring) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Politics and Truth - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

What is the relationship between truth and politics? Does democracy require truth or pervert it? Can truth thrive in any type of government? What's really at stake here? In this course, we will explore a variety of classic texts, ranging from such authors as Plato to Karl Marx to Hannah Arendt to Martin Luther King, Jr. to contemporary feminist theorists. We will focus on developing the ability to reflect on your own beliefs, analyze authors' arguments, and to articulate and defend your own perspective.

(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Family Ties - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

In this course, students will engage a number of classic works of literature and philosophy, as well as contemporary works, in order to reflect on the ways the family shapes private and public life and is, in return, shaped by them. We will cover such questions as: how does the family create and then influence the individual? What does it mean to be part of a family? What do individuals owe their families and are those obligations fair? How do we form families? Can the family insulate individuals from politics and society— in good ways and bad? Is political order like familial order? Are the state and society a threat or support for the family? How have these understandings changed over time?

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: How Words Change Worlds: Writers, Politics, and Power - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)
Jean Paul Sartre tells us words are like "loaded pistols." They have the power to transform worlds and inspire revolutions. Focusing on the power of language and the ideas they carry, we will look at writers as agents of social and political change. How do governments and society react to their work (censors, the media, readers?) We have two goals: to examine the interaction between aesthetics and politics, and the relationship between writers and governments. We will include some of the "greats" such as Rousseau, Swift, Orwell, Sartre, Andrei Platonov, Solzhenitsyn, Rushdie, and Chinua Achebe.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
What is the relationship between personal experience and political thought? How do political thinkers grasp and convey the connections between self and political order? Our first-year seminar will probe the links between heart and mind in political philosophy by exploring the lives and writings of illustrative figures who together span the history of political thought. Texts will include memoirs and fiction as well as abstract theoretical works.

POLIT-106-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Comparative Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides an introduction to comparative political analysis, one of the four subfields of political science. The primary objective is to help students understand how the "modern" world, one characterized by the rise of industrialized nation-states, took form and what shape it might take in the post-Cold War era. We will examine how the challenges of economic development, social transformation, and nation-building sparked the emergence of alternatives to "modernity" characterized by diverse configurations of political institutions and social forces. We will also assess how globalization and the re-emergence of local identities may be redefining our understanding of "modernity."

(Fall) Politics of the Self
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar
In an era where Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram are ubiquitous, self-presentation is a constant concern and practice. What are the politics of self-presentation and -cultivation, if any? Do the choices we make about diet, how to dress, where to shop, and our friends have any political valence? To what extent can these choices be thought of as a form of resistance to popular culture in an era where rebellion is marketed to us? This course will probe these questions by considering the connections among self, appearances, discipline, and the way these are dependent upon the recognition of others. Readings will include the Stoics, American transcendentalists, Rousseau, Nietzsche, and Foucault.

POLIT-208-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Chinese Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the politics of contemporary China. Beginning with an assessment of the origins of the Chinese Revolution, the course then examines core institutions and events in the People's Republic, including the Great Leap Forward, Cultural Revolution, post-Mao reforms, and the Tiananmen Incident. In addition, the course analyzes the changing nature of state-society relations, the emergence of new social and political identities, and China's role in the international arena.

(Fall) Contemporary Russian Politics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Russian and Eurasian Studies 240)
Russia was transformed by communist revolution into a global superpower that challenged the dominant ideologies of liberalism and nationalism. It became a powerful alternative to capitalism. In 1991, this imperial state collapsed and underwent an economic, political, and cultural revolution. What explains the Soviet Union's success for 70 years and its demise in 1991? What sort of country is Russia as it enters the twenty-first century? Is it a democracy? How has Russia's transformation affected ordinary people and Russia's relationship to the West?

(Spring) East Asian Politics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the dramatic rise of East Asia in the post-World War II period in comparative perspective. The focus will be on understanding the process and consequences of rapid development in Japan, Korea, Taiwan, and China. Assesses the strengths and weaknesses of the "East Asian model of development" and explores how different developmental experiences and policies affect state-society relations, social and political identities, and prospects for peace and cooperation throughout the region.

POLIT-230-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Resistance and Revolution
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the dynamics and causes of protest, rebellion, and revolution. Topics include the three "great" revolutions - the French, Russian, and Chinese - as well as such social science theories as moral economy, rational choice, resource mobilization, political culture, and relative deprivation. Attention will be devoted to peasant protest and elite responses to resistance movements. The objectives of the class are to familiarize students with alternative explanations of revolutionary change and to provide students with an opportunity to link general theories to specific case studies.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, with Politics 106

(Fall) Introduction to Feminist Theory - *Not offered this year/term
(Gender Studies 221CC)
This course explores the overlapping dualities of the feminine and the masculine, the private and the public, the home and the world. We examine different forms of power over the body; the ways gender and sexual identities reinforce or challenge the established order; and the cultural determinants of "women's emancipation." We emphasize the politics of feminism, dealing with themes that include culture, democracy, and the particularly political role of theory and on theoretical attempts to grasp the complex ties and tensions between sex, gender, and power.

(Spring) Black Metropolis: From MLK to Obama
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Africana Studies 234)
"Black Metropolis" refers to the more than half a million black people jammed into a South Side ghetto in Chicago at mid-twentieth century that featured an entrenched black political machine, a prosperous black middle class, and a thriving black cultural scene in the midst of massive poverty and systemic inequality. This course will follow the political, economic, and cultural developments of what scholars considered to be the typical urban community in postwar United States. We will examine such topics as Martin Luther King's failed desegregation campaign, Harold Washington, first black mayor; William Julius Wilson's urban underclass thesis; and the rise of Barack Obama.

(Spring) Oil and Water Don’t Mix: Geopolitics, Energy, and the Environment - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 242)
Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

POLIT-243-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Latin American Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement (Latin American Studies 243)
Why has Latin America struggled to achieve democratic stability? Why is it the region of the world with the highest economic inequality? How have the periodic political and economic crises allowed for creative experimentation with policy alternatives to create a more equal and sustainable social order? This course examines the political and economic evolution and transformation of Latin America from the time of the European conquest until these very days, with a particular focus on the 20th century. It will also analyze how these general trends took specific shapes in each of the 7 countries studied: Mexico, Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Chile, Venezuela and Bolivia.
Prerequisites: so, jr, sr. Politics 106 (Comparative Politics) is recommended.
Instructors: C. Fernandez-Anderson
Expected enrollment: 25

POLIT-246-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Spring) American Political Thought - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores limited government, popular sovereignty, representative institutions, checks and balances, republicanism, liberty, equality, democracy, pluralism, liberalism, and conservatism, and how these concepts have developed during three centuries of American politics and in contrast to European thought. The focus is not on the writings of the "great thinkers" but on the "habits of thought" of the American people and on ideas implicit in laws and institutions that affect the allocation of authority and power within the constitutional order.
Prerequisites: Politics 104, or History 170, 171, or 270
Instructors: C. Pyle

POLIT-247-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Spring) International Law and Organization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course presents international norms and institutions for regulating conflict, including promoting economic well-being, protecting human rights, exploring and using outer space, and controlling exploitation and pollution of the oceans. The course considers international agreements, problems of lawmaking, interpretation, and compliance; nationality and the status of foreigners and their investments; the principle of self-determination; and interests of postcolonial states as they impinge on the international legal order.

(Spring) Topics in Politics: Parties and Movements in American Politics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course explores the relationship between political parties and social movements in the US. Through a historical examination of abolitionist, labor, civil rights, and other movements, we will analyze how formal electoral politics intersects with the more fluid politics of protest and direct action. We will look at how parties have grown out of, allied with, co-opted or eschewed movements for social change. Students will develop a clear analytical sense of the conditions that facilitate successful movement-party dynamics, concluding with critical assessments concerning the impact of the Tea Party, Occupy Wall Street, and Black Lives Matter.

(Fall) Gender and Power in Global Contexts: The Politics of Abortion in the Americas - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement (Gender Studies 250AB)
The Americas have been characterized by the strictness of their laws in the criminalization of abortion. In some countries abortion is criminalized even when the woman's life is at risk. What role have women's movements played in advancing abortion rights? What has mattered most for a movement's success, its internal characteristics or external forces? Has the way the movement framed its demands mattered? How has the political influence of the Catholic and Evangelical churches influenced policies in this area? We will answer these questions by exploring examples from across the region through primary and secondary sources.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; GNDST-250RP, LATAM-287RP)
Since the 1990s Latin America has witnessed increasing societal and political debates over sexual and reproductive rights. Issues such as abortion, gay marriage, transgender rights, sexual education and assisted reproductive technology have risen to the top of some countries’ agendas after decades of silence, taboos, and restrictive or non-existent legislation. The course aims to provide a survey of sexual and reproductive rights in the region as a whole while at the same time highlighting the disparities that exist within it. The course analyzes the multiple factors behind the current policies focusing particularly on the role of women and LGBT movements advancing more liberal legislation.
Prerequisites: Previous coursework in Latin American Studies and/or Gender Studies recommended.

(Spring) Russia and the West - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 241)
Since its creation at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Soviet Union dominated the minds of Western foreign policymakers. None of the West’s policies in the Middle East, the Third World, Europe, or China after World War II can be understood without the study of Soviet foreign policy. We will examine the development of Soviet foreign policy since 1917 and, following the collapse of the USSR in 1991, the role played by Russia and Russia and the former Soviet republics in the far more complex and multipolar “New World Order.” What should U.S. policy be toward the emerging new states of the Baltics, Central Asia, and Caucasia?

(Spring) Imperial Neoliberalism
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Africana Studies 341NE, Critical Social Thought 349NE)
This course is a critical exercise taught at the intersection of two seemingly incommensurable terms, imperialism and neoliberalism. Charting the genealogies of these terms, we will explore the lines of entanglements that hold these two concepts together as mutually reinforcing projects. In part the course will address how self-governance and self-determination under liberal democratic regimes work to accomplish the neoliberal objectives, hence curtailing the legitimacy of the sovereign will as an essential democratic value. This course will also focus on ways neoliberal mandates legitimize the expansion of imperial extractive capacity beyond what physical territorial aggrandizement limited.

(Fall) Nationalism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 330)
Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Russian and Eurasian Studies 316FR)
The enlargement of the European Union (EU) to Central and Eastern European countries has generated new neighbors to the east and south - the Western Newly Independent States (WNIS) of Russia, Belarus, Moldova, and Ukraine, and Southern Mediterranean countries (SMCs) Egypt, Libya, and Tunisia. Europe’s new neighbors make up 410 million inhabitants, but their GDP capita is barely one tenth of the European Union’s. This has brought problems for the EU, including migration pressures, human trafficking, and refugees. How is the EU dealing with these issues and how will relations with the new neighbors affect the domestic and foreign policies of the EU?

(Fall) Politics of Decolonization
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Africana Studies 321)
This seminar is a critical exploration of the various processes, accounts and theories of colonialism and decolonization in Africa and the Americas. The aim is to chart alternative paths to rethinking the meaning and impact of these terms. Focusing on the various colonial/imperial tools employed to subjugate, exploit and dominate colonized subjects, we will examine how liberal discourses/structures that are assumed to embody the terms of freedom and sovereignty have now become extensions of the colonial they were initially employed to overcome. The main objective of this course is to explore various approaches to redefining decolonization, noting the changing meaning of colonialism.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
What is ethical life and what is its relationship to democratic politics? Ethical life, or sittlichkeit, refers not to ethics but to the patterns of norms, habit, and thinking that elaborate, complement, or resist laws and political institutions. In this course, we will explore how the sphere of ethical life that is outside of political rule and legislation influences the shape of our politics. Our first readings, which will include Hegel, Nietzsche, William Connolly, and Judith Butler, will help us learn how theorists have understood the relationship between ethical and political life.

(Spring) Revolutions - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 350)
Preamble (for topics courses): By the 1980s, after the failure of Marxist revolutions, scholars and politicians declared that "history" and with it, the age of revolution was over. From now on, they said, all states will move toward the model of market capitalism. But the last decade of the 20th century and the first fifteen years of the 21st century have shown that history, and with it, revolution, is far from over. We will look at the American and Russian revolutions, at Nazism, the Iranian revolution of 1979, Eastern Europe in 1989, the 'colored revolutions,' and the Arab Spring. Revolutions are still with us, and we will study why.

(Spring) The Politics of Work - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This seminar explores the contentious relationship between work and politics. The focus will be on workplace dynamics and how technological change, gender, methods of labor organization, and management philosophy affect the way in which authority is structured and perpetuated. The experiences of such regions as the United States, Japan, and China will also be used to shed light on the future of labor and work in an age of increasing globalization.

(Spring) Black Migrations - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Africana Studies 356)
This seminar is a comparative examination of the migration of African-descended people within and to the United States. In succession, it looks at the original African diaspora through the Atlantic slave trade; the Great Migration of African Americans from the South; the immigration to the U.S. of African-descended people from the West Indies; and last, the movement of Africans from the continent to the United States since 1965 when immigration laws became more inclusive. We will evaluate the process of African Americanization for each new migratory group in all of its cultural and political ramifications. Course material includes articles, books, films, novels, and guest speakers.

(Fall) Democratization and Civil Society in East Asia - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the dramatic emergence of democratic institutions and civil society in East Asia. The primary aim of the class is to help students understand and analyze the process of democratic unfolding in Japan, Korea, and Taiwan. We will also evaluate China's recent, albeit limited experiments with democratic practices. We will begin by contrasting Western perspectives of democracy with both traditional and more contemporary Asian understandings of democracy. We will then focus on the actual processes of democratic consolidation in each of the cases, especially the developments that precipitated political crisis and ultimately, political change.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Writing-intensive)
People have long accused politicians of using rhetoric to pander to audiences and get what they want regardless of the truth. But democratic politics depends on communication to persuade and motivate others. In this course, we will analyze classical writings on rhetoric, contemporary democratic political theory, and hear from professionals in order to probe the relationship between rhetoric and politics. Students will also engage in an extended campaign simulation, in which they devise, implement, and react to campaign rhetorical strategies. Prior work in political theory is required and prior work in American Politics is strongly recommended.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; LATAM-387HR)
During the 1960s and 1970s military coups brought authoritarian regimes to power in the Southern Cone (Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay). Human rights movements emerged demanding information about victims of torture, executions and disappearances which became the way military regimes attempted to eliminate dissent. What accounts for the different role these movements in the transition and consolidation of democracy and the rule of law? Did they take part to the same extent in the design and implementation of accountability mechanisms to prosecute those responsible for the abuses? We will answer these questions through the analysis of academic readings, movies, and primary sources.

This seminar will explore same-sex politics in Africa. Drawing on seven recently published books, we will discuss morality, politics, social justice, transnational social movements, and political homophobia. We will also explore policy documents, public opinion data, and media coverage (both international and local). Students will write original case studies about the situation for same-sex practicing people in an African country of their choice.
Prerequisites: jr.sr. 8 credits in department of permission of instructor.

POLIT-387-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Advanced Topics in Politics: Why Is There No Socialism in the United States?
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
In the aftermath of the Great Recession, Occupy Wall Street, and Senator Bernie Sanders's primary campaign, socialism has entered the mainstream of American politics, giving rise to questions concerning why the US can't be more like, say, Denmark. But while the question of why there is no socialism in the US may be on the minds of many, the puzzle is not new. This course will examine the long history of socialist politics in the United States while analyzing why it never established roots in the American system. Drawing comparisons with other advanced democracies, this course will explore what socialism has meant in the American context and what factors have shaped its minority status.
Prerequisites: jr. sr.
Instructors: A. Hilton
Expected enrollment: 18

POLIT-391-01 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Pivotal Political Ideas: Democratic Theory
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; CST 391DT)
Today democracy is seen as the only legitimate regime type, but there is very little consensus about what democracy refers to. This course will explore competing understandings of democracy and its relationship to state institutions and laws. Students will be introduced to contemporary debates over the normative basis of democracy and difficulties of democratic practice and citizenship. Among the questions we will explore are: what is the relationship between liberalism and democracy? Do rights represent the beginning or the end of democratic citizenship? Can democracy exist within a government or does it take form in opposition to it?

Prerequisites: jr. sr. 8 credits in department
Instructors: A. Aslam
Expected enrollment: 18

POLIT-391-02 - Politics - 2016-2017
(Fall) Pivotal Political Ideas: Capitalism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Critical Social Thought 391CT)
After reviewing the classic defense of capitalism as an engine of freedom, progress, and productivity, we will examine major shifts in the critique of capitalism from the early 19th to the early 21st century. This critical conceptual history will range over successive claims that capitalism fosters labor exploitation and class inequality, imperialism, instrumentalism, the commodification of culture, the privatization of the commons, and the re-making of subjectivities to suit market imperatives. The course will conclude with Pope Francis’s charge that the global capitalist system endangers “whatever is fragile, like the environment” and devours everything “in the way of increased profits.” Is Francis right, and if so, what are possible cures for these ills?
Prerequisites: one course in political theory or critical social thought
Instructors: A. Aslam
Expected enrollment: 18

(Spring) Pivotal Political Ideas: Capitalism II - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
The gains of global capitalism since the 2009 Great Recession and the laws and institutions organized to sustain the market have been breathtaking. What explains how and why citizens around the world have been unwilling or unable to imagine an alternative to free market competition? If citizens are genuinely committed to capitalism, why? During the first part of the course, we will consider these questions and the heightened fear that the triumph of the economy means the end of politics, at least in its democratic form. The second half of the course will conclude by examining the possibilities for post-capitalist politics, economic democracy, and alter-capitalism. Readings will include works by Hayek, Arendt, Lauren Berlant, Gar Alperovitz, and JK Gibson-Graham.

(Fall) Introductory Seminars in Psychology: Stress and Resiliency
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)
Is it true that what does not kill us makes us stronger? What is stress management? What is "stress culture"? This first year seminar will explore these questions, focusing on the relationship between stress and resiliency. We will consider different ideas about stress, adaptive coping, psychological resilience and their relationship to psychological and physical well-being. We will consider cultural differences in approaches to stress, as well as explore the impact of stress on our lives and society.

PSYCH-200-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Research Methods in Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides an introduction to the skills necessary for becoming good producers and consumers of psychological research. Students learn to develop research questions, survey related literature, design rigorous and ethically sound studies, and collect, analyze, and interpret quantitative and qualitative data. Students build on their computer skills relevant for psychological research and learn to read and critique original empirical journal articles. The course culminates in an original, collaborative research project, a final paper, and an oral presentation.
Prerequisites: Psychology 201 or Statistics 240

(Fall) Children’s Cognitive Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course covers the major cognitive theories and research findings on the development of children’s thinking from infancy to adolescence. Students will examine the nature and processes of change in six domains of knowledge: language, perception, memory, conceptual understanding, problem-solving and academic skills. Emphasis will be made on evaluating the practical implications of these cognitive theories and research.
Prerequisites: 100-level psychology course
Notes: NOTE: this course counts in the developmental or cognitive area.

(Spring) Psychopharmacology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Psychopharmacology focuses on the impact that drugs (both illicit and prescription) have on the brain, neurocircuitry, and behavior. Students will explore the underlying neurotransmitter systems of the brain and discover how substances influence nervous system function including the experience of pain, sleep, emotional states, motivation, addiction, and mental health. The course will bridge concepts in chemistry, biology, psychology, and neuroscience by highlighting major drug classes and their underlying mechanisms of action. Additional discussions will focus on the economic, social, and political aspects of the drug market, as well as ethics and legalities of the drug industry.

PSYCH-310-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Laboratory in Social Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course is conducted as a hands-on research workshop. Students will work collaboratively on one major social psychological research project during the semester. The projects typically focus on work/family issues, but other topics are possible. The methodology used depends on the project and could employ quantitative and/or qualitative methods. The course work follows the typical sequence required for research: reviewing the relevant literature, designing the method, analyzing data, and writing and presenting a final research report.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor. Students must meet with Prof. Deutsch during advising week to explain why they want to take the course
Instructors: F. Deutsch
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-310-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Laboratory: Social Psychology: Applied Social Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course)
In this course we will apply social psychological research practices to understand a social problem and work toward promoting positive social change. Specifically, we will use community-based participatory action research principles to investigate community concerns related to sexual and mental health, or community-identified pathways to promoting sexual and mental well-being. Students will develop a research project in partnership with community stakeholders, collect and analyze data, and produce a final product that is based on community priorities and is useful for community partners.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200
Instructors: C. Flanders
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-319-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Seminar in Social Psychology: Gender and Sexual Minority Health
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course is a critical overview and investigation of health as it relates to the experiences of gender and sexual minority people. We will begin with exploring theoretical understandings of health and marginalization, and use those as frameworks to examine various domains of health. Areas of interest will include mental health, sexual and reproductive health, substance use, disability, and issues related to body size and image. We will end by looking at other structural issues that affect gender and sexual minority health, such as access to care, health education, and health policy.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200
Instructors: C. Flanders
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-326-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Laboratory in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Personality Research

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course provides a hands-on introduction to psychological research in the domain of personality psychology. We will consider research methods, personality assessments, the intersection of personality and social psychology, and issues broadly relevant to psychological research. Students will work collaboratively in groups through all phases of a research project, including conducting a literature review, designing a study, receiving ethics approval, collecting data, conducting statistical analyses, and reporting the results. Projects will examine a topic within personality psychology and will be chosen by students in consultation with the professor.
Prerequisites: jr, sr; Psychology 200. A course in personality or social psychology preferred
Instructors: W. Davis
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-329-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Positive Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the emerging field of Positive Psychology which uses science to understand and enhance positive aspects of the human experience (i.e., "the good life"). Positive Psychology stands in contrast to more traditional psychological approaches that focus on pathology. We will critically examine theory and research in Positive Psychology, including strengths and virtues, meaning in life, positive coping, authenticity, happiness, gratitude, flow, religion/spirituality, and optimism. We will also explore applications and interventions informed by positive psychology in domains personally relevant to students’ lives such as school, work, and close relationships.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200; jr or sr; a course in personality, abnormal, or social preferred.
Instructors: W. Davis
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-329-02 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: First-Person Narratives of Madness
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Speaking- and writing-intensive
Psychiatrists conceptualize "mental illness" in terms of the symptoms and diagnoses in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM). But how are psychological distress or unusual states of mind understood by the people who experience them? In this seminar, we analyze accounts (historical and contemporary) written by those who have first-hand experience of extreme states, intense emotions, or unusual perceptions or beliefs, to understand how these "counter-narratives" offer new insights into psychological life.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in the department and permission of instructor. A course in Abnormal Psychology or Literature (any language) preferred.
Notes: Students must submit an information sheet (form available in department office) by noon on Friday of advising week to get permission to register for the course.
Instructors: G. Hornstein
Expected enrollment: 18

PSYCH-330-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Laboratory in Romantic Development: Observational Coding Methodology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Students will work in teams to code videotaped observations of romantic partners discussing their relationships. Students will learn to code emotion expressions and behavior, relationship idealization, and couple synchrony at the dyadic and individual levels. Students will address issues of coding bias, construct validity, and intercoder reliability. The final project will report original quantitative analyses based on data generated during the course.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200
Instructors: K. Haydon
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-331-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Lab in Early Social and Personality Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
In the role of a participant-observer, each student studies intensively the social and personality development of the children in one classroom at the Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook. Students learn how to articulate developmental changes and individual differences by analyzing detailed observations. Topics include social cognition, peer relationships, social skills, concepts of friendship, emotional development, identity formation, self-esteem, and the social and cultural context of development.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and 230

Notes: 2 labs (3 hours each) required at Gorse Children's Center
Instructors: A. Grillo
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-337-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar in Educational Psychology: Self-Directed Learning
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Are children "wired" to be able to learn without direct instruction? Does the process of schooling diminish or enhance our capacity to be self-directed learners? What factors determine one's readiness for self-directed learning, and can self-directed learning be "taught"? What role, if any, do teachers play in self-directed learning? This seminar explores these questions in the context of an ongoing ethnographic study of an alternative education program within a public high school. Participants will have a chance to engage with data from that study and practice qualitative research skills through site visits to schools that encourage self-directed learning.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Preference given to students who have taken Educational Psychology and have some familiarity with qualitative research.
Notes: Interested students should email Professor Grillo during advising week to explain why they want to take this seminar.
Instructors: A. Grillo
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-338-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Lab in Educational Psychology: Young Children, iPads, and Learning
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course)
Is there a place for digital technologies in play-based early childhood education? What value, if any, stems from children playing with educational apps with their peers in classrooms? How can digital play support children's meaning-making? This course uses a hands-on research approach to explore these and related questions while engaging with young children in preschool settings. Students learn how to collect observational data of preschool children interacting with iPad apps and conduct qualitative analyses. Topics of study include social play development, social competence, peer interactions, play-based learning, digital media literacies, multimodal learning, and digital play.
Prerequisites: Psychology 200, and Psychology 230 or Psychology 233. Permission of instructor.
Notes: 2 hours per week (one 2-hour block from 9-11 am) are required at Gorse Children's Center.
Instructors: S. Lawrence
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-339-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Seminar in Developmental Psychology: Language and Literacy Development in Early Childhood
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores how home and school learning environments influence the development of language and literacy skills of children ages 3-8. It examines situations in which families and schools, although utilizing different languages, dialects, and ways of communicating, can work together to enhance children's language learning. Particular attention is given to children's development of academic language -- the written and spoken language needed to understand and create texts required for success in school.
Prerequisites: Prior coursework in developmental psychology, educational psychology, or cognitive psychology required.
Instructors: J. Jacoby
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-339-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar in Developmental Psychology: Close Relationships across the Lifespan
This course will cover developmental implications of close relationships from infancy through adulthood with a focus on parents, friendships, and romantic partners. The goal is to examine normative developmental processes through a relational lens.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, and Psychology 230

Instructors: K. Haydon

Expected enrollment: 15

(Fall) Laboratory in Perception and Cognition: Cognition and Literacy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Community-based learning course)

Adult illiteracy in the U.S. presents an ever-growing challenge. To understand this problem, we will learn various theories of reading. However, since many models of reading are based on data gathered from children, we will also examine how the cognitive abilities of adults are different from those of children. A large component of this class concerns learning the lab techniques associated with assessing reading abilities. In addition, since this is a community-based learning course, each student will become a tutor for an adult enrolled in an area literacy program.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor. Students must email Prof. Binder during advising week to get permission to register.

Notes: 3 hours per week as a literacy tutor in Springfield is required.

Instructors: K. Binder

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-349-01 - Psychology - 2016-2017

(Fall) Seminar in Perception and Cognition: Language and Thought

Languages differ in the way they describe the world. For example, the noun for bridge is feminine in German, but masculine in French. Russian has two words for blue, while English has only one. The Piraha (an Amazonian hunter-gatherer tribe) arguably have no number words. In this course, we will be asking to what extent these cross-linguistic differences are reflected in thought. That is, do German speakers think bridges are more feminine than French speakers do? Can Russian speakers discriminate different shades of blue better than English speakers? Can the Piraha count? In exploring these questions, we hope to discover how tightly linked language and thought are.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200; a 200 level course in Cognitive Psychology recommended.

(Fall) Laboratory in Behavioral Neuroscience

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement

(Writing-intensive)

This intensive laboratory course will train students to use the technical methods and tools commonly used in behavioral neuroscience research. Skills covered will include animal care and handling, use of behavioral assays, pharmacology, and neurosurgical procedures. Students will engage in weekly exercises and hands-on experiments to study the link between brain function and behavioral responses. These preclinical tools will be used to test research questions related to learning and memory, social-emotional responses, and drug-seeking behaviors. After completion of this course, students will have a deeper understanding of the design and implementation of behavioral neuroscience research.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor

Notes: Interested students must meet with the instructor before or during the advising week to obtain additional information about the course.

Instructors: J. Schwartzer

(Spring) Seminar: Biological Bases of Behavior: Clinical Neuroscience

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Explore how psychology, neuroscience, and medicine come together to study the etiology and treatment of neuropsychiatric disorders. Students will examine the behavioral features and neurobiology behind various clinical disorders such as Autism, ADHD, Substance Use Disorders, Mood Disorders, Schizophrenia, Anxiety, and Neurodegenerative Diseases. The course will rely on primary research to identify how changes in physiology and biology might manifest in the behaviors that define psychopathology. Students will gain a deeper understanding of clinical and preclinical techniques used to study these disorders while bridging their knowledge of molecular, cellular, and systems neuroscience research.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200; Neuro 100 strongly recommended, or Per I

(Fall) Religious Movements in America - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
What is American religion? Is America a "Christian" nation? How has immigration affected the American religious landscape? How have struggles for freedom, civil rights, racial, economic, gender, and LGBTQ equality affected what people believe and how they act out these beliefs? To begin to answer these questions, we survey the main historical narratives of religion in the U.S. from the colonial period to the present. We also zero in at various moments in this history to appreciate the variety of religion and religious experience in American life. This combination enables us to engage the tension between the two main ways of considering religion in America: the quest for religious consensus and the recognition of a thoroughly pluralistic American religious culture.

(Spring) Religion and Politics in Modern India
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; History 223)
The history of India has been singled out for its complex intermingling of religion and politics. This course will explore the constitution of religious identities in two of India's largest religious communities: Hindu and Muslim. Focusing primarily on the colonial period, we will discuss religious reform movements, communal violence, mass politics, and the partition of the subcontinent into the independent states of India and Pakistan. Throughout we will be interested in the ways that the colonial experience affected the religious thought and practice of Indians. Finally, we will explore the meanings of this history for the postcolonial workings of democracy and secularism in modern India.

(Spring) Topics in Religion: Heretics, Martyrs, and Saints
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Heretics, Martyrs, and Saints investigates how early Christians described holy people as well as their nemeses. It explores how descriptions of martyrs, saints, heretics, demons, and even Satan himself were used to shore up the ever-contested boundaries of Christian orthodoxy and how the depiction of such figures forever changed the trajectory of Christian beliefs and practices. In the course of the semester we will read sources such as a letter from a Christian bishop wanting to be thrown to the lions, the dream journal of a female martyr, Gnostic gospels, wisdom from desert monks, and an ancient exorcism manual.

(Gender Studies 333FF)
Mary Daly, Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza, Phyllis Trible, and Judith Plaskow, among others, have argued that traditional Jewish and Christian theological systems have overlooked the needs, concerns, histories, and contributions of women. Their challenges range from the historical modification of a presumably unbiased religious system to the outright rejection of a so-called patriarchal establishment. Whatever their approach, feminist theologies offer diverse and incisive tools for understanding how a theological system operates, how transitory cultural assumptions become embedded in ongoing doctrines, and how apparently minor adjustments can have significant ripple effects.

*(Fall) Seminar in American Religious History: The Shakers - Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

(Gender Studies 333PP)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers advanced students an opportunity to investigate with some sophistication a problem that requires careful attention to research methods, to critical literature, and to writing. Seminar topics include people, periods, or problems that have a particular bearing on religion in America.

This course will examine the historical and cultural creation of the Shaker society. The religious vision of an alternative society whose birth and development paralleled that of the new American nation; by contrast and by imitation, the separate Shaker route thus offers an intriguing critique of American society and its values, and an unusual laboratory for examining a religious community based on a dual godhead.

(Fall) Great Books: The Literature of Nineteenth-Century Russia
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
In no other culture has literature occupied the central role it enjoyed in nineteenth-century Russia. Political, social, and historical constraints propelled Russian writers into the roles of witness, prophet, and sage. Yet, far from being limited to the vast, dark “Big Question” novels of legend, Russian literature offers much humor, lyricism, and fantasy. We will focus on the Russian novel as a reaction to western European forms of narrative and consider the recurring pattern of the strong heroine and the weak hero. Authors will include: Pushkin, Lermontov, Gogol, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Chekhov.

(Spring) Anna Karenina and Contexts: Tolstoy on Love, Death, and Family Life - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English)
Anna Karenina (1873) is one of a series of important works Tolstoy wrote pondering love, death, the nature of happiness, and the foundations of family life. Our reading of Anna Karenina will be the centerpiece of this course which will also include works ranging from Childhood (1852) to The Kreutzer Sonata (1889), which shocked and repelled readers with its unsparring depictions of human sexuality and murderous jealousy. Film versions of works will be screened.

(Spring) Contemporary Russian Politics - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Politics 209)
Russia was transformed by communist revolution into a global superpower that challenged the dominant ideologies of liberalism and nationalism. It became a powerful alternative to capitalism. In 1991, this imperial state collapsed and underwent an economic, political, and cultural revolution. What explains the Soviet Union’s success for 70 years and its demise in 1991? What sort of country is Russia as it enters the twenty-first century? Is it a democracy? How has Russia’s transformation affected ordinary people and Russia’s relationship to the West?

(Spring) Russia and the West - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Politics 264)
Since its creation at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Soviet Union dominated the minds of Western foreign policymakers. None of the West’s policies in the Middle East, the Third World, Europe, or China after World War II can be understood without the study of Soviet foreign policy. We will examine the development of Soviet foreign policy since 1917 and, following the collapse of the USSR in 1991, the role played by Russia and Russia and the former Soviet republics in the far more complex and multipolar “New World Order.” What should U.S. policy be toward the emerging new states of the Baltics, Central Asia, and Caucasus?

(Spring) Oil and Water Don’t Mix: Geopolitics, Energy, and the Environment - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

(Fall) Topics in the Recent History of Europe: Postwar Societies: USSR and Eastern Europe
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(History 260PW)
What was it like to be a hipster in the Soviet Union? What does rock music have to do with political dissent? This course offers a critical inquiry into the fascinating and vibrant societies of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe from 1945 to 1989, with a focus on the former. While gaining an understanding of the major political developments from late Stalinism to the end of Communism, we will explore the creative ways in which citizens of the Eastern bloc expressed their agency and initiated societal change. Using a range of primary and secondary sources, including film and literature, we will study themes such as postwar childhood, fashion, music, political dissent, and environmentalism.

(Spring) Topics in the Recent History of Europe: The Cold War: Perspectives from East and West
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(HIST-260CW)
This course provides a comprehensive introduction to the social, cultural, and political history of both Western and Eastern Europe since 1945. By exploring the permeability of the "Iron Curtain," the course encourages students to critically assess conceptions of division and unity in European history. We will explore ways in which borders were both reinforced and transcended. Topics include the legacy of the Second World War, migration, science, the division of Germany and its re-unification, tourism and the experience of the "other," sport as a unifying culture, the power of media, social protest, transatlantic relations, and the end of the Cold War.

RES-251-01 - Russian and Eurasian Studies - 2016-2017
(Spring) Advanced Russian - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): We will study a variety of texts and set them into the cultural context that marks them as distinctly Russian. Texts will be selected from a broad range of genres and sources. Readings, discussions, short oral and written reports. Special attention to complex grammatical constructions and vocabulary building. Taught in Russian.
This course aims at expansion of students' vocabulary and improvement of both writing and speaking skills. The course is intended for students who have completed at least four semesters of Russian or the equivalent. Heritage learners of Russian (those who speak the language) will also benefit from the course. With a strong emphasis on integrating vocabulary in context, this course aims to help students advance their lexicon and grammar, increase fluency, and overcome speaking inhibitions. We will read and discuss a variety of texts including short stories, films, and articles.

(Spring) Silk Road, Old and New - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Taught in English; Politics 312)
The silk roads were ancient transportation and trade links that wound their way across the Eurasian continent, or by sea through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean, to Europe. They carried silk, glass, jade, and moved religions and literatures across continents. Today, the new silk roads carry oil, gas, drugs, capitalism, and immigrants seeking better lives. We will investigate the parallels between the ancient and modern silk roads and the contemporary strategie, cultural, and economic significance of these new highways, which link China, Central Asia, the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe.

(Spring) European Studies Seminar: Foreigners Within, Foreigners Without: The EU and its New Neighbors - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 316FO)
The enlargement of the European Union (EU) to Central and Eastern European countries has generated new neighbors to the east and south - the Western Newly Independent States (WNIS) of Russia, Belarus, Moldova, and Ukraine, and Southern Mediterranean countries (SMCs) Egypt, Libya, and Tunisia. Europe's new neighbors make up 410 million inhabitants, but their GDP capita is barely one tenth of the European Union's. This has brought problems for the EU, including migration pressures, human trafficking, and refugees. How is the EU dealing with these issues and how will relations with the new neighbors affect the domestic and foreign policies of the EU?

(Fall) Nationalism - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Politics 308)
Preamble (for topics courses): Courses in this section satisfy the distribution requirement in social sciences.
Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?
Prerequisites: 8 credits in politics, international relations, or Russian and Eurasian studies
Notes: 1 meeting (2.75 hours)
Instructors: S. Jones
By the 1980s, after the failure of Marxist revolutions, scholars and politicians declared that "history" and with it, the age of revolution was over. From now on, they said, all states will move toward the model of market capitalism. But the last decade of the 20th century and the first fifteen years of the 21st century have shown that history, and with it, revolution, is far from over. We will look at the American and Russian revolutions, at Nazism, the Iranian revolution of 1979, Eastern Europe in 1989, the 'colored revolutions,' and the Arab Spring. Revolutions are still with us, and we will study why.

(Spring) Race in America: Let's Talk
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
From the Black Lives Matter movement to debates about immigration and a color-blind America, race and ethnicity are at the forefront of contemporary public discourse. In this course students will be introduced to the various sociological perspectives and theoretical frameworks used to understand racial and ethnic relations in the United States. Racial and ethnic identities remain an important aspect of how people view themselves and others. In this course, we will discuss the dynamics of individual racial and ethnic groups including African Americans, Latino Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, and White Americans. We will also examine what the concepts of race and ethnicity mean and how they affect various aspects of American society.

*(Fall) Special Topics in Sociology: Social Networks: Who You Know, How You Know Them, and Why It Matters - Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Social networks are much more than the people you know on Facebook and Twitter. They affect everything from political beliefs to health outcomes to professional success. This course asks, "What are social networks?" and examines their impact on contemporary life. Students will develop the analytical skills to understand the formation, evolution, and significance of different relationship structures and the way they shape individuals' lives.
Prerequisites: 4 credits in Sociology
Instructors: T. Malacarne
Expected enrollment: 30

SOCI-216-02 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Sociology of Media
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores the social organization of mass media systems as well as the various factors -- cultural, economic and political -- that have influenced their development. It asks: what is the connection between mass media and the large modern, democratic societies we inhabit? The first part of the course examines the historical development of mass media and the social theories that sought to interpret and explain its social impact. The second part considers the political and economic factors that structure contemporary mass media, paying particular attention to media deregulation and conglomeration. In the third part of the course, we explore the emergence of newer media forms such as the internet and digital/satellite television.
Prerequisites: Sociology 123
Instructors: E. Townsley
Expected enrollment: 30
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Cults, Conspiracies, and Moral Panics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Using case studies such as the Eugenics Movement, Jonestown, and the Kennedy Assassination, this course will examine how distrust of the government, originally motivated by logical concerns, has transformed the way people think about power in the postmodern era. The class will explore the difference between rational questioning of authority and blind distrust that leads to questionable claims. Through topics such as the War on Drugs, this class shows how the powerful are able to use biases and public fears to carry out their own, often counterproductive, measures. These case studies have issues like race and class at their core. We will examine how certain social issues have managed to endure.

SOCI-216-03 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Social Network Analysis: Analyzing Who You Know and How It Matters
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
Social networks analysis investigates social structures by looking at the actors in a system and the relationships between them. Its techniques can be used to map everything from Facebook friendship networks to the connections between corporate boards to status hierarchies in monkeys. In this class, students will learn the practical skills needed to do their own network analysis. The course uses R, but no prior programming experience is required.

SOCI-223-01 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Development of Social Thought
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines the origins and development of sociological theory in the nineteenth century. Focusing on the three most important representatives of the classical tradition in sociology—Karl Marx, Max Weber, and Emile Durkheim—we consider in detail the ideas of each, compare their perspectives on emerging industrial society, and assess their contemporary significance.
Prerequisites: Sociology 123

(Fall) Survey Research and Data Analysis
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is an introduction to the use of quantitative data in sociology. It focuses on the ways in which data is collected, analyzed, and presented to make sociological arguments. Students will be asked to analyze data for both regular assignments and a final paper. The aim of the course is to show how to understand the uses of different types of survey data, and to create and analyze simple statistics and multivariate statistical models using statistical software.

SOCI-231-01 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Criminology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course focuses on the historical and theoretical development of the major approaches to crime and criminality. Criminology began in the second half of the nineteenth century when its pioneers asked the "big questions" pertaining to crime, society, and human nature. As criminology progressed, it narrowed its focus, concentrating on special areas, such as violent crime and property crime. As sociology began to dominate criminology, new theories were developed to explain the social facts gathered in the last 50 years.

(Spring) Social Problems
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This is a course on the social construction of social problems. It devotes almost exclusive attention to how a "problem" becomes a social problem; examining how atypical cases become regarded as typical; how definitions are expanded to inflate statistics; and how claim makers and advocacy groups manipulate the media to market social problems and solutions to the public.
Prerequisites: Sociology 123
Instructors: R. Moran
Expected enrollment: 25
SOCI-240-01 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Collective Behavior and Social Movements
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course examines instances of organized collective action in social, historical, and empirical contexts, from the labor movement of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries to the new social movements of today. We also explore various forms of unstructured protest, such as riots and demonstrations.

(Fall) Special Topics in Sociology: Unlawful Convictions in Death Penalty Cases - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
The Death Penalty in America: Unjustly Convicted Death Row Inmates. This course will examine in detail the cases of all 130 death row inmates exonerated in the post-Furman era (1976-2009). It will focus on how the 130 men ended up on death row, as well as the process by which they gained their freedom. In addition, the course will spotlight the many proposals, videotaped police interrogations, eyewitness identifications, forensic science procedures, etc., designed to correct sources of mistakes; and assess their likelihood of successfully preventing both unjust and wrongful convictions in capital cases.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in the department including Sociology 231 or 234
Instructors: R. Moran
Expected enrollment: 16

SOCI-316-01 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Black Cultural Production and Consumption
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets cultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
This course explores black cultural production and consumption in the United States using a sociological lens. The central focus is how the production and consumption of cultural objects such as visual art, music, and television reproduce and erode racial boundaries. Topics include the construction of racial identity through consumption; representations of blacks in the media; and the impact of cultural tastes and preferences on black achievement.

SOCI-316-02 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Sociology: Sociology of Culture
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
What is "culture"? How has it changed over time? This course examines the definition (including religion, language, food, etc.), the social settings in which culture is produced, and the products of culture we consume (literature, film, music, painting, theatre, fashion, popular magazines, graffiti, and television, etc.). Course topics include: how to analyze culture and who produces it, the forces shaping markets for artistic objects and performances, politics and culture, the effects of censorship, globalization, and class differences.
Prerequisites: Sociology 123
Instructors: N. Michaud Wild
Expected enrollment: 19

SOCI-316-02 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Sociology of 9/11 and the War on Terror
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
We will explore the cultural and political impact of the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. The media's role in constructing meanings will be a main organizing focus of the course. Using readings, discussions, assignments, and films, the course will allow students to form a picture of how 9/11 changed America and beyond. Course topics include: the way the mainstream media constructed 9/11 and alternate ways they could have; how popular culture and the Public Sphere responded; complex historical factors leading up to 9/11; reasons the attackers say they committed the attacks; ways the event changed culture and politics in the world; conspiracy theories.

SOCI-316-03 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Sociology of Organizations
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
(EOs-349RG)
Sociology of Organizations introduces concepts of institution, organization, network, role and system. These ideas are at the heart of the classical sociological enterprise. They open up questions of social scale and social context by drawing attention to the level of action between individuals and abstract global systems. Using case studies, students will engage the question of ethical action in a complex world marked by competing rationalities. Using resources from class readings, students will be asked to research an organization of which they are a member to develop their own case study.
Prerequisites: SOCI-123
Instructors: E. Townsley
Expected enrollment: 19

(Fall) Topics in Sociology: Latina/o Immigration
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III requirement
(Community-based learning course; Gender Studies 333UU, Latina/o Studies 360)
The course provides an historical and topical overview of Latina/o migration to the United States. We will examine the economic, political, and social antecedents to Latin American migration, and the historical impact of the migration process in the U.S. Considering migration from Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean, we will discuss the social construction of race, the gendered nature of migration, migrant labor struggles, Latin American-U.S. Latino relations, immigration policy, and border life and enforcement. Notions of citizenship, race, class, gender, and sexuality will be central to our understanding of the complexity at work in the migration process.
Notes: Community-based learning is optional in this class.

SOCI-317-01 - Sociology - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Contemporary Social Thought: Cultural Sociology and Contemporary Theory - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III requirement
This seminar examines some recent developments in cultural sociology and contemporary social theory. The first part of the class asks: How do we imagine social things? The second part of the class reviews the history of social theory with a focus on the multiple crises of the modernity narrative, and various attempts to resolve these crises. The final third of the class poses the question of how to analyze culture and "do" social theory.

Prerequisites: Some familiarity with social theory is required (for example: Sociology 223 or some substitute), 8 credits in sociology

(Fall) FYS: Breakfast in America - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Have you ever thought about the origins of the sugar, coffee, bananas, and chocolate that we consume at the breakfast table? Who cuts the sugar cane? Who owns the coffee plantation? What are the social and environmental costs of bananas? This interdisciplinary course examines some of the cultural, historical, social, political, and economic issues surrounding these Latin American commodities. We will explore the lives of company owners, laborers, producers, and consumers as we trace the role sugar, coffee, bananas, and chocolate have played in the historical and cultural development of Latin America. We will also how these products are represented in art, literature, and film.

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)
One of the hallmarks of a liberal arts education is to draw on a broad base of knowledge in order to interrogate common assumptions. No one exemplifies this critical approach better than French philosopher Michel Foucault. One of the most influential thinkers of recent times, Foucault revolutionized several academic disciplines and even questioned the very notion of a discipline itself. He did so by revealing the history and transformations of ideas now viewed as self-evident. This first-year seminar invites students to develop similar analytical skills. Following Foucault's lead, the course pays special attention to preconceptions about government, freedom, identity, and sexuality.

(Fall) Identities and Intersections: An Introduction: Constructing (Our) America - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

Who are we? This is the question that Latin American writers, artists, philosophers and politicians have attempted to answer through fiction, nonfiction, visual arts, and film. Through representative cultural texts from figures such as D. F. Sarmiento, José Martí, Gabriela Mistral, Marta Rojas, and Hugo Chávez, we will explore discourses of identity, different sociopolitical positions, and the representation of race and gender in the construction of "latinoamericanidad."

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This interdisciplinary course provides an introduction to the political and cultural landscape of Latin America through the lenses of some of its social movements. It focuses on some of the region's most recent polemics and political innovations in order to establish the foundation for a deeper understanding of contemporary Latin America while interrogating its geopolitical boundaries. Some themes are the impact of social movements on national policy shifts, the significance of indigenous groups for political discourse, or the use of human rights agendas in local contexts.

(Fall) Studies in Language and Society: An Introduction: Being Bilingual - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of specific form/meaning relations in the linguistic system of Spanish and the function of language in society. Topics may include, but are not limited to, languages in contact, bilingualism, teaching methodology, translation and interpretation, sociolinguistics, phonetics and phonology, morpho-syntax, semantics and pragmatics. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course will introduce students to key issues and concepts in the study of bilingualism with a focus on communities in which Spanish interacts with other languages in Latin America, Spain, and the United States. One of the main goals of the course is to create awareness about the multidimensional nature of bilingualism as an individual, socio-political, cultural, and a psycholinguistic phenomenon. Topics will include degrees of bilingualism and the notion of "bilingual continua", language acquisition and language processing, relations between language and identity, the linguistic effects of other languages in different Spanish varieties, language maintenance and language loss, language policies and bilingual education.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333BW)
Preamble (for topics courses): This course will concentrate on the various literary genres and cultural movements that have shaped Latin America from modernismo to the present. Topics will focus on different genres and the expression of diverse ideologies through literature. During the Spanish Empire (16th-18th centuries), witches, prostitutes, transvestite warriors, lesbians and daring noblewomen and nuns violated the social order by failing to uphold the expected sexual morality of the ideal woman. They were silenced, criticized, punished, and even burned at the stake. Students will study contradictory discourses of good and evil and beauty and ugliness in relation to gender in the Spanish Empire. We will analyze historical and literary texts as well as film versions of so-called "bad" women--such as the Celestina, Elena/o de Céspedes, Catalina de Erauso and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

Preamble (for topics courses): This course will concentrate on the various literary genres and cultural movements that have shaped Latin America from modernismo to the present. Topics will focus on different genres and the expression of diverse ideologies through literature. The study of Afro-Hispanic literature has grown recently with the recovery and reexamination of lost texts and forgotten authors, as well as the desire of contemporary authors to contest the invisibility and racial ideologies in their national literatures. We will examine texts by Afro-descendant authors of in the Spanish-speaking world of the nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first centuries. We will read a variety of genres and discuss the construction and meaning of "race," color, national and cultural identity--which are in constant dialogue with dominant discourses. Secondary objectives include the development of research and writing skills and rudimentary theoretical orientation.

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: Memory (of) War
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Film Studies 370MW, Critical Social Thought 349MW)
Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
The medium of cinema has shown persistent concern with war and memory, and has constituted a heated battleground for rememberance and erasure of the past. Through cinema, in other words, we most clearly see both memories of war and subsequent wars among competing memories. The Spanish Civil War (1936-1939), the repressive military regime of Francisco Franco (1939-1975), and recent attempts to "recuperate" memory all dramatize these dynamics and raise a number of larger questions. How do destruction and devastation register through the visual? What happens when we attempt to police memory (through censorship, propaganda, etc.)? What and why do people choose to remember or forget?

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neocolonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.
This class will interrogate the limits and possibilities of talking about a slanted or queer subject position with the context of Latin American literature.
Looking at texts from the Caribbean, Central America and South America, we will explore the construction of a queer subjectivity through literature, film and visual art. We will pay careful attention to the intersections of class, race, gender, and sexuality to speak of queerness not only as a sexual orientation, but also as a decolonial intervention. Readings will draw from philosophy as well as literature.

The bloody dictatorships that took place during the 1970s and 1980s in the Southern Cone left behind a legacy of political violence, torture, sexual abuse, and disappearance of political dissidents. The Southern Cone states themselves became sadistic death machines like never before in these countries’ histories. Bodies became territories of punishment and discipline as well as of struggle, resistance, and difference. We will analyze the way in which recent cultural production (film, novel, short stories, and theatre) of the Southern Cone and historical texts imagine and represent those “body struggles” through transvestite and queer bodies and dissident women’s bodies, and by replacing the masculine icons of the left-wing militants and the state military terrorists of the 1970s.

Topics will include exploring distributions and relationships, planning for data production, sampling distributions, basic ideas of inference (confidence intervals and hypothesis tests), inference for distributions, and inference for relationships, including chi-square methods for two-way tables and regression.
Prerequisites: 2 years of high school algebra
Instructors: J. Gifford
Expected enrollment: 35

STAT-140-01 - Statistics - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to the Ideas and Applications of Statistics
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
This course provides an overview of statistical methods, their conceptual underpinnings, and their use in various settings taken from current news, as well as from the physical, biological, and social sciences. Topics will include exploring distributions and relationships, planning for data production, sampling distributions, basic ideas of inference (confidence intervals and hypothesis tests), inference for distributions, and inference for relationships, including chi-square methods for two-way tables and regression.

(Fall) Elementary Data Analysis and Experimental Design - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II requirement
A fundamental fact of science is that repeated measurements exhibit variability. The course presents ways to design experiments that will reveal systematic patterns while "controlling" the effects of variability and methods for the statistical analysis of data from well-designed experiments. Topics include completely randomized, randomized complete block, Latin Square and factorial designs, and their analysis of variance. The course emphasizes applications, with examples drawn principally from biology, psychology, and medicine.
Prerequisites: Any 100-level mathematics or statistics course
Instructors: The department

Theatre Arts

THEAT-100-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Introduction to Theatre
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Taught by Department of Theatre Arts faculty and staff, this course offers the student a study and practice of theatre as a collaborative art. Course includes an analysis of the dramatic text in terms of the actor; the director; the scenic, costume, lighting, and sound designers; and technicians. Close analytical readings of play texts and critical/theoretical essays will be supplemented by attending theatre productions both on and off campus and by staging students' own theatrical projects.
Notes: requirement for the Theatre major
Instructors: H. Holder
Expected enrollment: 36
THEAT-105-01  - Theatre Arts  - 2016-2017
(Spring) Acting I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course will focus on basic Stanislavski techniques: concentration, imagination, relaxation, objective/action, and beats/scene analysis. Each student will apply these concepts to one open scene, one monologue and one realistic contemporary scene.
Instructors: N. Tuleja
Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-120-01  - Theatre Arts  - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Design: Costume Construction
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This course take students through the theatrical process of creating clothing and accessories for the stage. Topics covered are hand sewing techniques, fabric identification and use, and clothing alterations. The course will explore basic pattern drafting and draping, and some accessory construction. Students will work from costume renderings to build and alter clothing for Rooke Theatre productions.
Notes: lab; materials fee $45
Instructors: E. Bergeron
Expected enrollment: 10

THEAT-122-01  - Theatre Arts  - 2016-2017
(Fall) Scene Design I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and work of the set designer in the performing arts. Students will learn how a designer approaches a script, how this work impacts a production, and what means are used in the execution of the process. They will learn how to develop their own visual imaginations and how to create visual concepts through discussions, renderings, models and some hand drafting. No previous experience in theatre, performance, or the visual arts is required.
Notes: lab; materials fee of $50. Theatre tickets and any additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student
Instructors: V. James
Expected enrollment: 16

THEAT-126-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Lighting Design I - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and practice of lighting design for the theatre. This course will cover the basics of light, lighting equipment and how to develop a design for a theatrical production. Students will have the opportunity to use the Black Box Light Lab to create their own lighting designs from selected scenes of plays and musicals and learn the basics of programming a computerized lighting board. Students enrolled in this class will automatically be signed up for the Theatre Arts Department Light Prep Crew for the semester, where students learn to hang and focus lights on the Rooke Stage for the department's mainstage productions.
Instructors: L. Dubin
Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-127-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Intro to Lighting and Sound Design
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and practice of lighting & sound design for the theatre. This course will cover the basic tools and techniques of designing light & sound and provide an understanding of the designer's role in the collaborative process of producing a show. Students will have the opportunity to create their own lighting & sound designs in the Black Box classroom and present them to the class. In addition to class time students are required to complete 24 hours of light prep crew - this is an extension of the class where students will learn how to hang and focus lights, read a light plot, and work as a lighting team on the Theatre Department main stage productions.
Notes: Purchase of theatre tickets is the responsibility of the student.
Instructors: L. Dubin
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-171-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Studies in Dance History - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Dance 171)
This course is designed to present an overview of dance as a performing art in the twentieth century. Through readings, video and film viewings, guest performances, individual research projects, and classroom discussions, students will explore principles and traditions of twentieth-century concert dance traditions, with special attention to their historical and cultural contexts. Special topics may include European and American ballet, the modern dance movement, contemporary and avant-garde experimentation, African American dance forms, jazz dance, and other cultural dance traditions.
Instructors: C. Flachs
Expected enrollment: 20

THEAT-180-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Introduction to Technical Theatre
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Art Studio 137TC)
This course will examine the materials and techniques used in building and operating theatrical scenery. It will include prop building, rigging, and welding for the theatre. Students will learn the skills to work in the scene shop interpreting scenic designs for department productions.
Notes: lab; supplies fee of $40 for material. Theatre tickets are the responsibility of the student
Instructors: S. Hill
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-205-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Acting II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
A continuation of techniques developed in Acting I. Concentration is on scene work with "classic" and contemporary realist playwrights, i.e., Chekhov, Ibsen, Williams, Churchill, Kane, etc. Students will perform at least four scenes using the Stanislavski method as their base. Practical tools explored in class are intended to offer the student greater vocal, physical, and imaginative freedom and clarity, as well as text analysis skills.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 105
Instructors: N. Tuleja

THEAT-222-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Scene Design II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Students will study and compare the work of significant designers, and use this research to inspire and inform the growth of their own work. They will familiarize themselves with the best contemporary practices through reading current articles, reviews and critiques. They will develop a design project for inclusion in a portfolio and will gain a working knowledge of Photoshop, InDesign, and Vectorworks. They will assist design for the department's spring musical Cabaret. There will be an intensive weekend field trip to New York City and students will exhibit and present their semester's work in the final class.
Prerequisites: 100 Intro to Theatre and 122 Scene Design I
Notes: materials fee $50. Any additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student
Instructors: V. James
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-224-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Costume Design - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
An introduction to the art and work of the costume designer in the performing arts. Students will learn how a costume designer analyzes a script, approaches research, renders costume sketches, and how this work impacts a production.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 100, 120, an art (studio) course
Notes: lab; purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student--a supply list will be provided
Instructors: J. Ford
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-224-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Costume Design II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Through practical and studio work, students will refine their creative process to industry standards. Course covers text and character analysis, drawing, painting and the designer's responsibility.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 124
Notes: lab fee for materials $50
Instructors: E. Pangburn
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-227-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Lighting and Sound Design II - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
Taking basic lighting and sound design skills to the next level, this course will provide a more in-depth study of the skills needed to design lighting and sound for the theatre. Students will have the opportunity to focus on their main area of interest — lighting or sound — or continue study in both subjects. In addition to individual design projects presented in the Black Box classroom, students will actively participate in the light and sound designs of department productions, along with possible student productions.
Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 127
Instructors: L. Dubin
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-234-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Theatre Studies: Androgyny and Gender Negotiation in Contemporary Chinese Women's Theater
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
(Taught in English; Asian Studies 215, Gender Studies 204CW)
Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China's social changes and the women's movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.
Instructors: Y. Wang
Expected enrollment: 19
THEAT-234-02 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Topics in Theatre Studies: American Drama, 1787 to present
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 234)
This course offers a broad survey of American drama in the context of performance traditions such as minstrelsy, melodrama, realism, the Broadway musical, and the avant-garde. We read works that challenge and expand concepts of national identity and their connection to discourses of race, class, ethnicity, and gender. How do the characters and landscapes of these plays reflect historical events and theatrical inventions? What do they tell us about what it means to be an "American," and how have our answers changed over time? Playwrights will include Tyler, Baker, Aiken, Brown, Boucicault, O'Neill, Stein, Hurston, Treadwell, Wilder, Williams, Miller, Shepard, Kennedy, Wilson, Mamet, Hwang, Kushner, Parks, Ruhl, and Jacobs-Jenkins.
Instructors: H. Holder
Expected enrollment: 25

(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Stage to Screen
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 217, Film Studies 220SC)
A study of ten to twelve plays and their film adaptations. Plays are drawn from a range of periods and genres, and films are chosen to show the scope of adaptive approaches from filmed play to radical re-imagining. The course will include readings on the theory and history of theatre-to-film adaptations. Playwrights will likely include Christopher Marlowe, Oscar Wilde, Tennessee Williams, Eugene O'Neill, Lorraine Hansberry, Edward Albee, Harold Pinter, David Mamet, and David Henry Hwang.
Prerequisites: 4 cr in English, Film Studies, or Theatre Arts
Instructors: S. Sutherland
Expected enrollment: 18

THEAT-234-GT - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Greek Tragedy and Film - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Classics 212)
This course examines the evolution of tragedy in classical Athens from choral performance to sophisticated drama through the contributions of the three most important tragedians: Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Attention is given both to the political context in which the plays were performed and to the dramatic effects employed by the playwrights that made the stage an influential medium of powerful artistry. Students will also study the influence of ancient tragedy on film by examining dramatic strategies modern directors employ and the allusions to Greek tragedy found in some innovative films by Roman Polanski, Woody Allen, Jules Dassin, Michael Cacoyannis, and others.
Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes) plus 1 screening

THEAT-251-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Histories of Performance I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I requirement
A survey of world performance history, including: the evolution of human language and consciousness; the rise of oral, ritual, and shamanic performance; religious and civic festivals; and imperial theatre practices that position the stage at the dangerous intersection of religious worship, public taste, royal patronage, and government censure. Understanding performance as both artistic practice and social institution, this course emphasizes the role performance has played in changing audiences and as a cultural and political force in various societies. We explore not only how performances were created—in terms of design, dramaturgy, architecture, and acting—but also for whom, and why.

(Spring) Dance and Culture - *Not offered this year/term

(Dance 272)

What are the functions that dance serves in society? How does the dancing body signify cultural values? How is dance a vehicle for the articulation of cultural identities? This course attempts to answer these questions from the perspective of dance anthropology and, on occasion, dance history. We will analyze documentaries and texts that illustrate the diverse manners in which dance ethnographers and historians approach the study of dance as a cultural expression. Balancing breadth and depth, the course focuses on a handful of dance forms from North America, Latin America, Africa, Asia, the Middle East, and Europe.

(Fall) Topics in Theatre Studies: Early Modern Drama - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(English 317MD)
All the world's a stage. This course surveys the era of literary history that invented this powerful idea. The drama of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is a drama obsessively self-conscious, bursting with disguises, confidence tricks, cross-dressers, rituals, masques, and plays-within-plays. Reading Shakespeare as well as his rivals and peers (Marlowe, Jonson, Webster, and others), we will consider how theater, and the idea of theater, illuminates such concepts as desire, evil, gender, and ideology. Plays will likely include Titus Andronicus, Doctor Faustus, The Alchemist, and The Duchess of Malfi.
Prerequisites: English 200 and English 210 or 211
Instructors: S. Roychoudhury
Expected enrollment: 15

THEAT-350-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Fall) Seminar: Women in Shakespeare
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
This is a performance seminar focusing on the female characters in Shakespeare and using Tina Packer's (Founding Artistic Director of Shakespeare & Company) Women of Will: Following the Feminine in Shakespeare's Plays as the jumping-off point for exploration of Shakespeare's plays. In her book, Packer traces the evolution of Shakespeare's female characters, while examining his own growth as a writer from youthful misogynist, to lover, to unabashed feminist. This course will explore that journey, both through analysis and performance, and each student will be required to perform three to four scenes and monologues illuminating that idea.
Prerequisites: 8 credits in Theatre Arts
Instructors: N. Tuleja
Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-350-01 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017
(Spring) Seminar: Marlowe, Jonson, Middleton - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement (English 317MJ)

A seminar on three major early modern dramatists--Christopher Marlowe, Ben Jonson, and Thomas Middleton--focusing on the range of genres, characters, conflicts, and aspirations explored in their plays. These playwrights, along with their contemporary Shakespeare, shaped the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century theatre into a site for performing authority and conquest, national and individual identity, trickery and carnival, desire and sexuality, and complex unfoldings of revenge. Readings of two or three plays by each of the three dramatists will be supplemented by recent studies of early modern theatricality.

Prerequisites: Juniors and seniors; English 200 and 210 or 211.

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

Instructors: S. Sutherland

Expected enrollment: 15

THEAT-350-02 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017

(Fall) Seminar: Performance Criticism Workshop - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Meets Humanities I requirement

This seminar immerses students in the Five College theatre scene, with opportunities for travel to regional professional theatres. By approaching live performance from a critical perspective, students rethink how they see, understand, and respond as audience members. How does the practice of theatre-going relate to public discourse? What is the social function of theatre today? Weekly readings include contemporary theatre criticism and selected plays. Each student writes a number of short reviews over the semester. In-class workshops provide opportunities for discussion and revision. Students learn the arts of editing and offering feedback to others.

Prerequisites: sr or jr with Theatre Arts 251 and 252; soph with permission of instructor

Notes: This course may be taken more than once. Purchase of theatre tickets is the responsibility of the student.

Instructors: H. Holder

Expected enrollment: 12

(Spring) Seminar: Women in American Theatre and Drama - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement (Gender Studies 333BB)

This course offers a history of women in performance, from the colonial era to the present day. Americans inherited a European theatrical economy that was largely male dominated, though actresses played a central role on stage and in the public imagination. Today, while serious inequities remain, women are gaining access to the most privileged and powerful positions in a swiftly changing field. We are therefore equally interested in how women have participated in theatrical culture—as actors, producers, playwrights, directors, designers, managers, and audience members—and how they have been represented on commercial, experimental, and regional stages, and across genres and communities.

Prerequisites: Gender Studies 101, or Theatre 100 or 251 or 252

Instructors: E. Rundle

Expected enrollment: 16

THEAT-350-04 - Theatre Arts - 2016-2017

(Spring) Seminar: Women in Design - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement

This course will discuss women who have made a seminal contribution to the way we see and experience the visual world through design and material culture including the performing arts, film, fashion and couture, the decorative arts, gardens and interiors. Students will familiarize themselves with the work of Coco Chanel and her female contemporaries, Gertrude Jekyll, Zaha Hadid, Irene Sharaff, Loie Fuller, Sonia Delaunay, Lyubov Popova, Margaret Macdonald, and Eileen Grey as well as many other groundbreaking luminaries. Students will research and analyze a designer's work, and create written and visual presentations. Students will also design a small project.

(Spring) Seminar: Liars, Pranksters and Jesters on the Italian Stage

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement (Writing-intensive; ITAL 301)

This course explores the role of lies and practical jokes in Italian literary culture and the way the concept of humor has changed over time. We will investigate the intimate connection between power, religion, and laughter by reading some of the funniest and politically charged works. Our authors (Machiavelli, Goldoni, Pirandello, De Filippo, Fo) will take us through the streets of Renaissance Florence, eighteenth-century Venetian canals, as well as the improvised "factory theaters" of the 1970s.

Notes: Taught in English. Students who wish to obtain Italian credit will have to do all of the readings/writings in Italian and participate in a tutorial with Professor Frau.

Instructors: O. Frau

(Fall) Seminar: Witches in the Modern Imagination - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I requirement
(Gender Studies 333WT)
From the middle ages to the present day, witches have evoked both fear and fascination. Their fellowships (real or fantastic) challenged the prevailing power structures of church and state patriarchies and upset the ordered precepts of the modern world. This seminar offers an overview of the history of witchcraft in Atlantic cultures, with special attention to the early modern British and American colonial eras. We will examine figures of the witch in European art; religious and legal texts that document the persecution of sorcerers; and dramatic, literary, and cinematic representations of witches that have helped to shape our understanding of gender, nature, theatricality, and power.
Prerequisites: Jr/Sr, Gender Studies 101, and required online application, preference to Gender Studies and Theatre Arts majors.

X.ART-246-01 - Art (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Introduction to Contemporary Art
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this course, by drawing on methods that have risen to prominence in art history since its "global turn," we will emphasize the historical contexts for various art currents. We will analyze the diverse artistic, discursive, and economic practices that have constituted contemporary art around the world since 1980. While studying artists from six continents, the class also will examine the venues in which contemporary art is exhibited. Topics will include artists in Port-au-Spain, Trinidad, and Nigeria; public art in Marfa, Texas, and Moscow; biennials in Sao Paulo and Shanghai; and art fairs in Sharjuah and New Delhi.

(Summer) Human Physiology with Lab
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
With humans as our primary model system, we will cover cellular and general tissue physiology and the endocrine, nervous, cardiovascular, digestive, respiratory, and renal organ system. Primary emphasis is on functional processes in these systems and on cellular and molecular mechanisms common across systems. Students will engage in class problems, lectures, and laboratory activities designed to strengthen knowledge of physiological concepts and of fundamental scientific, quantitative, and analysis skills.
Prerequisites: Human Anatomy I expected, but not required.
Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.CHEM-101-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) General Chemistry I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Introduces and develops fundamental concepts in chemical science, including stoichiometry, reactions in aqueous solutions, atomic structure, and chemical bonding. The laboratory emphasizes basic skills and quantitative chemical measurements.
Prerequisites: basic arithmetic, algebra, calculator use
Instructors: H. Jayathilake
Expected enrollment: 20

X.CHEM-201-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) General Chemistry II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Continuation of General Chemistry I. Topics include thermochemistry and thermodynamics; quantitative treatment of chemical equilibrium with applications to acid-base, solubility, and electron-transfer reactions; and chemical kinetics. Laboratory emphasizes analytical skills and experimental assessment of kinetic and thermodynamic parameters.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 101 with grade of C or better
Instructors: H. Jayathilake
Expected enrollment: 20

X.CHEM-202-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Organic Chemistry I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Introduces organic chemistry, emphasizing the principles governing broad classes of reactions. Topics include stereochemistry, nucleophilic substitution and elimination reactions, the chemistry of alkanes, alkenes, alkynes, alcohols, and ethers, and an introduction to infrared and nuclear magnetic resonance spectroscopy. Laboratory work includes synthesis, practice in the techniques of distillation, crystallization, chromatography, molecular modeling, and identifying unknown organic compounds by chemical and spectroscopic means.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 201 with grade of C or better
Instructors: D. Hamilton
Expected enrollment: 20

X.CHEM-302-01 - Chemistry (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Organic Chemistry II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
A continuation of Chemistry 202 that addresses the chemistry of aromatic compounds, the carbonyl group, and a number of other functional groups. Examples drawn from compounds of biological interest. The laboratory includes organic synthesis and the identification of unknown compounds by chemical and spectroscopic means.
Prerequisites: Chemistry 202 with grade of C or better
Instructors: D. Hamilton
Expected enrollment: 20

Communication (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.COMM-105-01 - Communication (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(January) Speaking With Confidence: Leadership for Women
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking-intensive)
This course helps both experienced and aspiring professional women identify what they want to communicate in all aspects of their lives. Drawing on a variety of theatre techniques used by experienced actors to relax, focus their message, and connect with an audience, this course will coach students in the art of confident and powerful communication. Students will be guided to uncover their unique strengths, develop an authentic and personalized speaking style, and overcome obstacles to delivering their message. Working closely together in a safe and supportive environment, students will complete the course with the presentation of an inspiring speech.
Notes: This course may be repeated for credit.
Instructors: S. Daniels

Computing and Technology (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.CMTC-109-01 - Computing & Technology (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) iDesign Studio - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Designers are continually innovating ways of incorporating technology into today’s world, from projections of butterflies on Grammy performance dresses to “smart” purses that sense a missing wallet. The recent emergence of low-cost, user-friendly components is making this new world of design accessible to a broad community. In this course, students will think critically about products already in the marketplace and will be given the tools to create their own designs. A sequence of hands-on workshops on electronics basics and microcontroller programming will provide the surprisingly minimal level of comfort and background in technology required to produce prototypes of these designs.

(Summer) Teacherpreneurs and Teacher Leadership: The Changing Role of Educators - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Explore the changing role of educators in a colorful political climate. Education is in the midst of a transformation, and we will learn from and with teacher leaders who are leading the charge. With readings and video-conferencing with National Board Certified Teachers, bloggers, and state teachers of the year, we will discuss how innovative teachers are transforming the profession in issues of equity, evaluation, compensation, curriculum, collaboration, and more. Students will also identify their leadership skills, then build their areas of expertise and develop a plan for potential future leadership.

(Summer) Queering the Curriculum - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course considers how we can think ethically, critically, and in socially just ways about disrupting the silence around LGBTQ issues in K-12 schools. Drawing on work from the fields of anti-oppression education, critical pedagogy, and queer theory, we will explore ways to challenge heteronormativity and heterosexism, and to promote gender and sexuality equity within K-12 schools. Through course work and class activities we will examine heterosexism as a system of oppression; the complexities of sex, gender, and sexuality; the institutional aspects of heterosexism in educational contexts; and contemporary issues facing educators who want to implement LGBTQ curriculum.

(Summer) TESOL Certificate: Teaching English as a Second or Foreign Language
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This four-week program is designed to provide participants with a foundation of practical pedagogy, linguistic knowledge, and classroom experience to prepare you for a job as a language instructor in an international environment. The course includes lecture and discussion, materials development sessions, microteaching workshops, and a teaching practicum with a minimum of 6 hours of teaching experience. Participants will develop a teaching portfolio for use in their job search and receive a certificate of completion with a passing grade.

(Spring) Policy Fluency: Current Issues in Education
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this learning experience, teachers will work on building up their "education policy fluency" based on their own school context. Students will read education news from across the country, including Education Week and blogs from a range of teacher and education bloggers with varied perspectives. Then they will dig into deeper understanding through weekly dialogue with each other and article authors and current teacher leader experts in the field. This course aims to help teachers gain an even stronger understanding of the policy world that influences what we do in the classrooms, in both public and private school settings.
Prerequisites: Graduate students only

(Summer) Leading Colleagues Using Research: Bridging the Gap Between Research and Practice
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Based on Domain 2 of the Teacher Leader Model Standards, this class helps build the skills, knowledge, and dispositions teacher leaders need to support colleagues in using the latest research and data to improve practice and student learning. Topics we will explore include types of research, examining the research process, the skills teacher leaders need to lead colleagues in using research to improve practice, research competencies, action research, data collection and analysis, how research makes instruction intentional and systematic, and how it allows us to make meaning out of numbers.

(Summer) Teaching with Technology
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Students will read current research examining the effectiveness of teaching with technology in PreK-12 classrooms as they explore questions about the role of technology in 21st century education. Students will experiment with a variety of tools that allow teachers to design effective lessons for a diverse range of learners. Students will focus on using technology to integrate students on IEPs, 504, and other learners with specific learning needs.
Prerequisites: MAT students only
Instructors: L. Manzi
Expected enrollment: 20

X.EDUC-420-01 - Education (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Schools, Schooling, and Society
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course familiarizes teacher candidates with theories of teaching and learning, human development and current movements in education reform. In keeping with Massachusetts Department of Education mandates for approved licensure programs, the course provides the foundational readings to prepare teachers for work in a diverse society. Topics include knowledge of curriculum; child development; adolescent development; learners and educational goals; and inclusive pedagogy for a range of learners. Key tenets of EL Education will be unpacked through participation in an EL slice.
Prerequisites: MAT students only

(Spring) Practicum Seminar on Teaching and Learning: Early Childhood and Elementary Education
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This weekly seminar for MAT students provides students with opportunities to examine curriculum development models, develop an integrated curriculum unit utilizing state and national content area standards, review researched based models of classroom management, and engage in dialogue with practicing teachers regarding numerous aspects of teaching and student learning. Additional topics covered include the arts in education, physical education, legal obligations of teachers, and home-school communication. As is the case in all pre-licensure programs, there is continued emphasis on addressing the needs of students with disabilities and English Language Learners.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Limited to students accepted into the MAT program
Instructors: C. Swift

(Spring) Student Teaching in Early Childhood and Elementary Schools
Credits/PE Units: 10; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Students participate in full-time student teaching in early childhood and elementary classrooms for 12 weeks. During this semester-long field-based placement, students hone classroom management skills, implement an extended integrated curriculum unit, deliver lessons in all content areas, and develop a wide range of assessment skills. The practicum culminates in two weeks of Lead Teaching, during which the student is responsible for managing all aspects of the classroom program. Students work with classroom teachers and college supervisors to address Professional Teaching Standards as required by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts’ Pre-service Performance Assessment Program.
Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Students must be accepted into the MAT program
Notes: 5 days a week for 12 weeks full-time student teaching in school site (includes Mount Holyoke College's spring break). This course is graded on a credit/no credit basis.

(Fall) The Process of Teaching and Learning in Secondary and Middle Schools
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
This course is intended to help prepare prospective secondary and middle school teachers for effective classroom instruction. The focus of this course is to explore a range of philosophies of education and existing classroom practices. The course uses the current educational landscape in order for teacher candidates to examine culturally relevant teaching and learning practices, teaching in multicultural settings, establishing the classroom climate, choosing instructional approaches, and attending to the needs of a range of learners.
Prerequisites: MAT students only

(Summer) Equity and Social Justice: A Teacher's Role
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this course, participants will learn to address issues of social justice seamlessly and incorporate social justice into the design of their learning environments. This will be accomplished in three steps: First, participants will be assigned a self-awareness partner to process socialization around social issues. Second, participants will produce narratives about their social justice development. Finally, participants will create action plans that will create learning environments that don’t shut down dialogues about difference, but open them up. Participants will then take this new learning and self-awareness and apply it to education systems outside of their classroom.

(Fall) Teachers as Agents of Change
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Grounded in peer-reviewed research, this class helps build the knowledge, skills, and dispositions for teachers to advocate for students, the teaching profession, and policies that benefit student learning. Students will engage in modules on entrepreneurial thinking, building a courageous mindset, the development of expertise, relationship-building, messaging, persuasive writing, and public speaking. Students will also revisit the change process and explore multiple entry points for advocacy in and out of the classroom. This class includes several videoconference sessions with advocacy leaders in the field.

(January) Personal Growth and Articulation of Practice
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
We will further develop as reflective practitioners, and to use that reflective practice to explore personal leadership development. Critical course concepts will be introduced in a whole group book study format. As a second step, course participants will create individualized learning plans that allow for deeper exploration of topics of personal and professional interest. The menu of options for personalized learning will include further reading in the domains of adult development, professional learning, motivation, and leadership. Additionally, it involves videoconferencing with several nationally recognized teacher leaders.

(Spring) Personal Leadership Growth and Articulation of Practice
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Along with our professional growth as educators, we must cultivate our personal leadership potential as well. In this course, students will work collaboratively to achieve two main goals: to further develop as reflective practitioners, and to use that reflective practice to explore personal leadership development. Critical course concepts will be introduced in a whole group book study format. As a second step, course participants will create individualized learning plans that allow for deeper exploration of topics of personal and professional interest. The menu of options for personalized learning will include further reading in the domains of adult development, professional learning, motivation, and leadership. Students will walk away from the class having developed a personal leadership growth plan as well as having amassed a collection of books and resources, which can be used to start their own professional learning groups with colleagues in their buildings, districts, or virtually.

(Summer) Owning Assessments and Data for Student Learning
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Built around Domain 5 of the Teacher Leader Model Standards, this course helps teachers build the skills to understand assessment and data, as we explore organizational improvement through assessment design. Learn to facilitate and support colleagues in using assessment tools to inform decisions to improve practice and student learning. This class includes an exploration of Improvement Science, where teachers will learn how small ideas can be tested and taken to scale, potentially impacted organizational change. It will also include several videoconferences with nationally recognized teacher leaders from across the country. Embedded in practice, focused on your personal and professional growth.

(Fall) Subject-Specific Methods for Middle and Secondary Teachers
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
This subject-specific methods course is designed for graduate-level teacher education students preparing to teach at the secondary or middle school levels. Firmly embedded within the Expeditionary Learning Model, this course links the theoretical underpinnings of subject-specific pedagogy, differentiated learning, global learning, sheltered immersion, assessment, and the community/school/classroom/students. Students will connect theory with practice through their work with subject-specific experts in the field and through reflecting on their practice within pre-practicum placements in local schools.

(Fall) The Process of Teaching and Learning: Developing Literacy in Early Childhood and Elementary Schools
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Community-based learning course)
Through a balanced and integrated approach, students will learn to develop literacy in early childhood/elementary schools. Class members will learn about emergent literacy, diagnosing language needs, integrating phonics skills in a literature-based program, the teaching of process writing, children's fiction and nonfiction literature, and a variety formative and summative ways to assess learning. Course required for spring semester practicum students. Course evaluation is based on written and oral work done individually and in groups. Requires a prepracticum.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Community-based learning course)

Students will learn about inquiry-based science/math curriculum and use of technology in PreK-6 classroom. They will construct more extensive understandings of science/math instruction by developing lessons that implement the Massachusetts Frameworks incorporating the Common Core State Standards for Mathematics. They will teach a minimum of three lessons to students in their pre-practicum setting. Emphasis will be on learning diverse management and instructional practices, such as the use of manipulatives, problem solving, cooperative learning, and project-based learning. Students will also become more adept at developing effective approaches to using assessment to guide instruction.

(Summer) The Hunger Games: Young Adult Dystopia in Popular Culture - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Fin de siècle popular culture has embraced the spectacle of young adulthood and tried to understand it through the lens of dystopian fiction. This course will focus on The Hunger Games (first book) to consider how it understands, interrogates, and shapes young adulthood for a contemporary audience. Questions of gender and agency will direct the exploration of this literary text and its film adaptation. The course is designed to develop the skills of careful reading and effective writing essential to success in undergraduate study. Students will write and revise their work frequently and participate in class discussions to practice asking critical questions and framing persuasive arguments.

(January) Shakespeare and Race
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Through characters such as Othello, Shylock, and Aaron the Moor, this course will explore how Shakespeare staged, to borrow Hamlet's phrase, the "theater of others". We will focus upon how Shakespeare's plays represent race and racial relationships in the early modern context. How do his plays both reinforce and critique socially and culturally constructed assumptions about race? How do they both draw upon and subvert or challenge dramatic conventions of race and why? What can we learn about race and attitudes towards race, in Shakespeare's time and our own, from the questions raised by his plays and their histories of theatrical interpretation and critical response?
Prerequisites: Introductory literature course, particularly a Shakespeare course.

(Summer) Jane Austen in Adaptation - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Jane Austen's work stands almost as its own subgenre in the evolution of the novel. Happening at a moment of transitions, her work can be read formally as a bridge between the experiments of eighteenth century realism and what was just to come in the Victorian novel. Although she is often admired for her humor and satire around marriage and sex, the novels also engage with aesthetics, epistemology, and sensibility: political ideas about what constitutes beauty, what it means to know something, and how much one should feel. We will read the completed novels, some of her influences and contemporaries, and critical and theoretical contexts.

Film (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.FILM-172-01 - Film (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(January) Chinese Hollywood: Through the Lens of Visual Literacy
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This is an intensive, interdisciplinary course exploring literature and research about China and, more specifically, Chinese women, through the analysis of Chinese film from historical, social, economic, political, and cultural perspectives. Students will develop visual literacy skills to learn to read and do a critical cultural analysis of Chinese film as visual texts. China's rapidly growing film industry, now referred to as "Chinese Hollywood," will also be examined as a cultural phenomenon with influence in China and throughout the world. This course will focus on selected key film directors whose films allow students to explore lives of Chinese and Chinese women. The course will be taught in English and all films will be viewed with English language subtitles.
Instructors: Y. Ma
Expected enrollment: 15

Languages (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.LANG-101-HN - Languages (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Intensive Elementary Hindi - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This intensive course introduces the student to speaking, listening, reading and writing skills in Modern Hindi. Students will learn to read and write the Hindi script and develop the cultural literacy required to participate in common everyday interactions. Class sessions and homework assignments will emphasize using the language in ways a student might encounter when living or studying in a Hindi-speaking environment. Students will be required to participate in oral exercises and role plays during the class sessions.
Instructors: B. Dwivedi

(Summer) Intensive Elementary Japanese I - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is designed for students who have never previously studied Japanese. The course will introduce the overall structure of Japanese, basic vocabulary, the two syllabaries of the phonetic system, and some characters (Kanji). The course will also introduce the notion of "cultural appropriateness for expressions," and will provide practice and evaluations for all four necessary skills: speaking, listening, reading and writing.
Instructors: W. Tawa
Expected enrollment: 20

Mathematics (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.MATH-404-01 - Mathematics (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Developing Mathematical Ideas: Working with Data - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Participants will work with the collection, representation, description, and interpretation of data. They will learn what various graphs and statistical measures show about features of the data, study how to summarize data when comparing groups, and consider whether the data provides insight into the questions that led to data collection.

Prerequisites: 01 section for MAMT students only.

Instructors: M. Riddle, V. Bastable

Expected enrollment: 30

(Fall) Fostering Algebraic Reasoning

Credits/PE Units: 3; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Enrolled students examine generalizations at the heart of the study of operations in the elementary grades. They express these generalizations in common language and in algebraic notation, develop arguments based on representations of the operations, study what it means to prove a generalization, and extend their generalizations and arguments when the domain under consideration expands from whole numbers to integers. In addition, they investigate the thinking of their own students working on similar ideas by recording and analyzing their own lessons and interviews with their students. Examination of the links between Common Core Math Practice Standards is also included.

Mathematics Education (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.MTHED-404-01 - MathEducation (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Spring) Effective Practices for Advancing the Teaching and Learning of Mathematics
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
The National Council of Teachers of Mathematics identified eight practices for effective teaching of mathematics and teacher leaders from around the country have been working to develop innovative ways to implement these practices in K-12 classrooms. Each live online session will explore a different practice in depth with one of the teacher leaders that designed it. Participants will then work to implement the practice in their own classrooms and analyze how it affects student learning. The live sessions will involve working through mathematical tasks, analyzing student thinking and effective instructional methodologies, and engaging in discussions with colleagues from around the country.

(Spring) Educational Leadership I: Coaching and Mentoring - *Not offered this year/term
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is designed for elementary math specialists with responsibilities for supporting teachers in the development of strong mathematics education programs. Participants explore issues related to: learning mathematics while in the context of teaching; facilitating the professional development of colleagues; teachers' and students' ideas about mathematics and learning; and fostering a stance of collaborative investigation. By way of a central theme of mathematics learning, the institute will offer coaches opportunities to explore, through the coaching perspective, ideas of number and geometry in the elementary grades.
Prerequisites: 01 section is for MAMT students only.

(Spring) Mathematics Coaching: Designing Effective Professional Development
Credits/PE Units: 3; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course provides opportunities for math specialists/coaches of grades K-8 to design, develop, critique, implement, give, and receive feedback on mathematics professional development experiences that align with the Common Core standards and the particular needs of the school/district’s participating staff. Topics include staying focused on mathematics while developing collaborative relationships, communicating with teachers and administrators, developing leadership skills, and continuing to be a learner. Emphasis will be placed on learning how to move a school and/or district toward their mathematics goals by providing both support and press for teachers who teach mathematics.
Prerequisites: 01 section is for MAMT students only.

Performing Arts (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.PERFA-138-01 - Performing Arts (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(January) Stage Combat
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course is designed to teach the fundamentals of stage combat. Students will be introduced to the principles behind unarmed, rapier, and rapier/dagger work. Attention will be given to partnering skills, weapon techniques, mechanics of choreography, and discovering how one safely creates engaging storytelling using the language of dramatic combat. No prior performance background is required, but students will be asked to perform two fight scenes with dialogue. By the end of the course students will have a solid understanding of: safety and partnering, weapon techniques, building, writing, rehearsing, and acting the fight.

X.PHYS-101-01 - Physics (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Physics I
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This algebra-based introduction to physics covers kinematics, force, Newton's laws, equilibrium, momentum, energy, conservation laws, gravitation, rotation, and oscillations. Jointly with the Physics 2 course, it will provide a good preparation for the physics components of the MCAT.
Prerequisites: Math competency up through but not necessarily including calculus
Instructors: H. Hatch
Expected enrollment: 20

X.PHYS-151-01 - Physics (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Physics II
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This is the second half of the algebra-based introductory physics sequence. Topics, drawn largely from the MCAT syllabus, include fluids and elasticity, thermodynamics, sound and light waves, electricity and magnetism, and atomic structure.
Prerequisites: Math competency up through but not necessarily including calculus
Instructors: H. Hatch
Expected enrollment: 20

Professional Studies (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.PRST-116-01 - Professional Studies (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(January) Law: Still a Noble Profession
Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course will examine what is required to become a lawyer, what the life of lawyers truly is like, and the numerous career options available to those with a law degree, not only in the legal profession but in other related fields. Students first will be exposed to many fundamental aspects of criminal law, family law, real estate law, constitutional law, and personal injury law; before then examining the complex ethical and business considerations attorneys encounter frequently in their daily practice. After a review of numerous critical terms of art, articles, essays, and landmark Supreme Court decisions, each student will conclude the course by making his or her own ten-minute closing argument.
Notes: Non-liberal arts course
Instructors: J. Guiel

Psychology (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.PSYC-100-01 - Psychology (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Introduction to Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course provides an introduction to Psychology. How do we make decisions, form attachments, and learn a language? Can we inherit schizophrenia? Why are we fearful of some situations and not others? What factors influence the way we form attitudes or develop prejudices? This course addresses such questions to provide an overview of current research in psychology.
Notes: This course is taught online.
Instructors: N. Gilbert Cote

X.PSYC-210-01 - Psychology (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(Summer) Social Psychology
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course surveys a range of topics within social psychology. How do other people influence us? How do people perceive one another? How do attitudes develop and change? Under what conditions do people conform to, or deviate from, social norms? We will survey concepts across several areas of social psychology with an emphasis on empirical research evidence.

(Summer) Adolescent and Adult Development
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
When we think of human development, we often think of the period between infancy and late childhood. However, contemporary research contends that we continue to develop in crucial ways across the "other" 3/4 of our lifespan. This course surveys human development from adolescence to late adulthood through consideration of major theories and current research relating to social, emotional, and cognitive domains. We will journey through adolescence and explore the search for identity, examine moral reasoning in young adulthood, appraise the classic theoretical approaches to midlife changes, define "successful aging" in late adulthood, and identify issues that surround death and bereavement.
Instructors: C. Lee
Expected enrollment: 20

Sociology and Anthropology (Professional and Graduate Education)

(Summer) Sociology of 9/11
Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
You will explore the cultural and political impact of the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. The media's role in constructing meanings will be a main organizing focus of the course. Using readings, discussions, assignments, and films, the course will allow you to form a picture of how 9/11 changed America and beyond.
Prerequisites: Intro to Sociology
Notes: This course is taught ONLINE.
Instructors: N. Michaud Wild

(Summer) The Inclusive Classroom: Strategies and Interventions for Promoting Learning and Positive Outcomes for All Students
Credits/PE Units: 3; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
This course surveys the etiology, diagnosis, and remediation of learning differences including dyslexia, attention deficit disorder, autism, as well as factors that influence a child's readiness to learn. Students present, discuss, question, and exchange ideas that contribute to an overall understanding of special education in the field. With an emphasis on inclusion in schools, students explore the impact of current policies, assessments, and practices. The focus is on adapting the learning environment, classroom structures, and approach to teaching so that all children, regardless of learning strengths and needs are supported to reach their potential and achieve meaningful goals.
Prerequisites: permission of instructor

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
Reading development, assessment, comprehension and instruction are central to the course. Through a combination of readings, lectures, & experiences, this course will provide students with the knowledge & skills to assess literacy needs and implement effective language arts instruction for all learners. The course includes a study of the writing process, with coverage of phonics, spelling, & grammar. The Massachusetts Curriculum Framework for English Language Arts and Literacy is addressed, as are all content objectives for the Foundations of Reading MTEL test required of Early Childhood, Elementary, and Moderate Disabilities (PreK-8 and 5-12) licensure candidates in the Commonwealth.

Writing (Professional and Graduate Education)

X.WRTNG-106-01 - Writing (Professional and Graduate Education) - 2016-2017
(January) Blank Slate and Blank Page: Generative Writing
Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
In this course we will learn to see the opportunity in the blank page & in the outlines of the sculpture that lies within the blank slate. We will learn strategies to give ourselves the structure we need to get started. We'll work with daily prompts for writing in various creative genres, using the visual, the somatic, and the written to get us started. We'll create prompts for one another & reflect on what is most effective to get us started & keep us moving. At the end of the course, you will have a collection of prompts you can use moving forward, as well as a whole collection of rough draft work to revise on your own time.

Prerequisites: A minimum of one course in freshman composition, an equivalent, or proof of waiver of such a course would be ideal in order to make sure students have English reading and writing fluency.

Notes: Please note that this is a two-credit, writing-intensive course. We will do quite a bit of work in just over two weeks, so be prepared to commit to reading and writing. It is imperative that you stay on track with assignments, which will build on each other. If you fall behind with reading or assignments, you will have difficulty completing the course.
